their power; they impriſoned them, and afterwards drew them out by twenty at a time, and put them to death, with all the circumſtances of rage and cruelty that civil fury could invent; when there were only ſixty remaining, they beſought the Athenians to put them to death, and not deliver them up to their countrymen. The Corcyrians, thereupon ſurrounding the place where they were confined, endeavoured to bury them under their darts, which throwing theſe unhappy men into deſpair, they ſtrangled and otherwiſe deſtroyed themſelves with their own hands. Such was the dreadful end of that miſerable ſedition, which for ſo many years rent this little iſland, and made the Corcyrians endure greater evils from themſelves, than they had ever felt from any enemy. The Athenians were this year ſucceſsful in ſome other expeditions, which, to avoid prolixity, we ſhall omit, and refer our readers to the account of them in Thucydides. In the winter, a Perſian embaſſador whoſe name was Artaphernes, being ſent to Lacedæmon, was intercepted in Thrace and brought priſoner to Athens. His letters and inſtructions were read, but when it was diſcovered, that they no way concerned the Athenians, he was diſmiſſed, and other embaſſadors from Athens were ſent with him to Epheſus, where, when they came, they were informed, that Artaxerxes the Perſian monarch was dead, by which their commiſſion being determined, they returned home. Towards the end of the year, the Athenians apprehended, that the inhabitants of Chios had an intention to deſert them, they therefore ſent a fleet thither, with orders that they ſhould demoliſh their new walls, a method they commonly practiſed on ſuch occaſions. Theſe were the principal events of the ſeventh year of the war.

In the beginning of the eight year of the war, there happened an eclipſe of the ſun, as Thucydides tells us, which was followed by an earthquake. The firſt matter of conſequence the Athenians reſolved on was, the taking of the iſle of Cythera, ſeated on the Coaſt of Laconia, which lay extremely convenient for them. Nicias was choſen to command in this expedition. This nobleman, even in the time of Pericles, had been eminent in the ſtate, and enjoyed a great meaſure of favour with the people. His qualifications were not extraordinary, for though he had much knowledge in military affairs, and knew perfectly well how to perform his duty as a general, yet he was exceeding cautious, fearful of treſpaſſing in the leaſt on his inſtructions, ſtructions, and timorous to the laſt degree of offending the people. Pericles, eſpecially in his latter days, governed all things with a high hand; he ſo much exceeded all others in eloquence, that to ſpeak and to perſuade were the ſame things with him, and the people, being confident that he was a friend to their power and authority, came readily into whatever he deſired. Nicias was of another diſpoſition, and therefore he ſought to acquire their good will, or rather to purchaſe it, another way; he had an immenſe eſtate, and he laid out a great part of it in beſtowing largeſſes, exhibiting plays, ſhews, and whatever elſe might pleaſe the people, who likewiſe pitied the timidneſs of his temper, and always encouraged him when he had any thing to offer or to propoſe to them. We have already mentioned his diſpute with Cleon as to the buſineſs of Pylus; the ſame man was his conſtant opponent in every thing, which is the leſs wonderful, ſince it is evident there was a direct contrariety both in their tempers and intereſts. Cleon was continually the author of warm and violent counſels, a lover of blood, and a vehement enemy of the Lacedæmonians; whereas Nicias was gentle in his manners, adviſed moderate meaſures, was for treating enemies with clemency; and though in all other reſpects he was fearful, yet he never diſſembled that he wiſhed well to the Lacedæmonians, that is, wiſhed his countrymen would rather conclude a peace with them, than break the power of that ſtate and their own by obſtinately continuing the war. The people, having a great opinion of his probity and conduct, appointed him general in this expedition into Cythera, and furniſhed him with a ſtrong fleet and a good army. Nicias executed his commiſſion punctually and ſucceſsfully, whereby he gained them a very commodious poſt, and brought the Lacedæmonians very ill neighbours; afterwards the Athenians took Thyrea on the confines of Laconia, this place the Lacedæmonians had given to the inhabitants of the iſle of Ægina when they were expelled by the Athenians, theſe with the Cytherans were ſent to Athens to abide the judgment of the people; the former they condemned to death, as being the ancient and invererate enemies of their ſtate and nation, the latter they diſperſed for the moſt part through the iſlands under their obedience, and on ſuch as they left in their own country they impoſed a very heavy tribute. In Sicily, one Hermocrates of Syracuſe perſuaded all the inhabitants of that iſland to adjuſt their differences among themſelves, whereby whereby the Athenian generals were conſtrained to re-embark their forces and return home. There were three of them, Pythodemus, Sophocles, and Eurymedon, they gave the people a diſtinct account of the reaſons which induced them to quit the iſland, and inſiſted particularly on this, that the Sicilians being reconciled to each other, they were in no condition to force them upon other meaſures; but the Athenians, who ſeldom conſidered any thing where ſucceſs was wanting, baniſhed two of their generals, and ſubjected the third to a very heavy fine. The inhabitants of Megara, finding themſelves exceedingly diſtreſſed from the continual incurſions of the Athenians and the miſchief done by their own exiles, began to have ſome thoughts of recalling thoſe they had baniſhed, of which when the Athenians had notice, they found means to engage the magiſtrates to aſſiſt them in quelling the townsmen. Hippocrates and Demoſthenes, two famous generals, were employed in this expedition, wherein the Megarians concerned exactly kept their agreement; the gates were opened, and the Athenians had taken poſſeſſion of the town, if on a ſudden ſome of the conſpirators had not altered their minds and gone over to thoſe who ſought to defend it, whereupon the Athenians and their friends ſeized the long walls, and threw up a croſs work againſt the city, bending all their force to make themſelves maſters of Niſæa, or the port, doubting not, that, if they had this, Megara would ſoon fall. The gariſon, having no magazines of proviſion, were conſtrained to ſurrender at diſcretion, after which the Athenians inveſted the city and cloſely beſieged it. Braſidas the Lacedæmonian came quickly from Corinth to relieve the Megarians, but the citizens being ſtill divided in their opinions, ſome ſiding with the Athenians, ſome with the Lacedæmonians, would not open their gates to any body. In the mean time, the Bœotians came with a conſiderable army and joined Braſidas, who thereupon engaged the Athenians; but it ended in a drawn battle; at laſt, however, the Lacedæmonian party prevailing in Megara, thoſe who ſided with the Athenians were many of them obliged to withdraw; after this the exiles returned, and were admitted into the city, on their taking an oath to forget all that was paſt, and not to attempt any thing which might diſturb their country. But as ſoon as they were ſettled, they forgot their oath, and [illegible] it all tenderneſs for their country, cauſed a hundred of thoſe whom they moſt ſuſpected to be apprehended, forced the people to condemn them, and, in conſequence of that judgment, put them all to death. They then changed the whole frame of the government, introduced an oligarchy, and poſſeſſed themſelves of the ſupreme power. The exiles of Mitylene, ſome other Leſbians, and a crew of mercenary troops, ſeized Rhetium in Aſia, and poſſeſſed themſelves afterwards of Antandrus; that they might not incumber themſelves with too many things, they ſold the former city to its ancient inhabitants, and were quickly after diſpoſſeſſed of the latter by the Athenian generals, Demodorus and Ariſtides; their collegue, whoſe name was Lamachus, ſailed to Heraclea in Pontus, where he pretended to levy tribute; but the Heraclians inſiſted, that, as they were ſubjects to the Perſian king, the Athenians had no right to any ſubſidies from them. While theſe points were litigating, a land-flood drove moſt of the Athenian ſhips on ſhore, and broke them in pieces, ſo that Lamachus found himſelf unable to act either by land or ſea. The Heracleans, inſtead of taking any advantage of this accident, aſſiſted the Athenians to the utmoſt of their power, ſo that with much ado Lamachus put his army into a condition to march through Thracia to Chalcedon. The Bœotians, growing weary of that form of government, which ſince their league with the Lacedæmonians had been introduced among them, began to cabal with the Athenians, and to invite them to aſſiſt in ſettling democracies throughout Bœotia; but this buſineſs was not very proſperous, for the Thebans and other Bœotians of their party drew together a great army under the command of Pantoedas. The Athenians were commanded by Demoſthenes and Hippocrates; at Delium the armies met and a very bloody engagement enſued, wherein the Athenians were at laſt beaten, and all hopes of their prevailing in Bœotia taken away, moſt of the Bœotians, who leaned to their party, being obliged to forſake their country and to take ſhelter in the Athenian territories. Thucydides the hiſtorian commanded at this time the Athenian forces on the coaſt of Macedonia, whither the Lacedæmonians had ſent Braſidas one of their beſt generals with a conſiderable army. He, partly by force, partly by perſuaſion, reduced Amphipolis and ſeveral other places; but Thucydides, by a quick march, ſaved Ione; and the Athenians, being extremely alarmed at the news of Braſidas's conqueſts, ſent

of

new

new supplies of men, money, and ships, in the winter to the Macedonian coast; but all their care could not prevent a mighty defection from their interest in those parts, where the valour and conduct of the Lacedæmonian chief carried all before him. These were the events of the eighth year of the war [c].

In the beginning of the spring the Spartans made new propositions of peace at Athens, supposing that the misfortunes, which their enemies had met with in Thrace and Macedonia, would render them more tractable than they had been before, in which they were not much mistaken; for the Athenians, finding that fortune was no more constant to them than to their enemies, and finding their affairs much unsettled by the loss of Amphipolis, agreed to a truce for a year, that they might have time to re-establish them. This truce was founded upon the following articles, that both parties should remain in quiet possession of what they held at present, that embassadors, heralds, and all other persons with public characters, should have free leave to enter any of the states in order to the negotiation of a general peace, that neither party should receive or protect deserters, that all controversies should be decided amicably, and not by force; proceedings at sea were likewise settled, and confederates on both sides were comprised in this truce. Immediately on the conclusion thereof, negotiations were set on foot for a general peace; but these were interrupted, and the Athenians thrown into new disorders by an accident in Thrace, where the city of Scione and the city of Menda revolted to Brasidas, who, knowing nothing of the truce, sought to draw over Potidæa also; the Athenians pretending that Scione revolted two days after the truce was concluded, clamoured loudly thereat, asserting that it was a breach thereof, and that both it and Menda should be restored them, which negotiations not having the power to effect, an army was sent to reduce them; by this army Menda was recovered, but Scione made an obstinate resistance, whereupon the Athenians encompassed it with a wall and turned their siege into a blockade. The spring drawing on, the Lacedæmonian army, under the command of Brasidas, made an attempt upon Potidæa; but it miscarried, and the Athenians began to recover some courage in this part of the world.

The

[c] Thucyd. lib. iv. Diodor. lib. xiv. Plut. in vit. Niciæ.

THE truce expiring on the day of the Pythian games, Cleon perſuaded the Athenians to ſend a great army into Thrace under his own command; it conſiſted of twelve hundred foot and three hundred horſe, all Athenian citizens, embarked on a fleet of thirty gallies. Cleon ſoon after his arrival took the city of Torone; but he miſcarried in his attempt on Stagyrus, which, however, did not diſcourage him from falling upon Galopſus, a colony of the Thaſians, which he took; after which he retired to Ione, waiting there for ſuccours. Braſidas, who had an army much inferior to his, obſerving that Cleon was become careleſs, and that his troops did not obſerve diſcipline, attacked the Athenians by ſurprize, and routed them with very great ſlaughter; Cleon himſelf flying at laſt, but not far, a Lacedæmonian ſoldier overtaking and killing him on the ſpot; Braſidas was mortally wounded in the beginning of the engagement, wherein the Athenians loſt ſix hundred men, and the Lacedæmonians no more than ſeven. This deciſive engagement had mighty effects on both parties, the Athenians were greatly humbled by the loſs of their army, and the Spartans little leſs concerned at the loſs of their general; beſides, the Athenians, in loſing Cleon, loſt the moſt popular ſpeaker amongſt them and the great promoter of the war; they therefore grew much more quiet and tractable than formerly, and were very ready to hear what the wiſe and prudent ſtateſmen amongſt them thought fit to offer in their public aſſemblies. Amongſt the Lacedæmonians there was likewiſe a conſiderable party, at the head of whom was Pliſtonax their king, who declared for peace, and who laboured as hard to effect it, as Nicias and his party did at Athens. Theſe proceedings induced various negotiations, which in the end brought on a peace for fifty years between the Lacedæmonians and Athenians, on the following conditions: That a reſtitution of places and priſoners ſhould be made on both ſides, excepting that Niſæa ſhould remain to the Athenians who had taken it from the Megarians, and that Platæa ſhould remain in the hands of the Thebans, becauſe they abſolutely would not give it up. The Bœotians, Corinthians, and Megarians refuſed to be included in this peace, but the reſt of the allies yielded to it, and it was accordingly ſworn to at Athens in the archonſhip of Alcæus ten years after the commencement of the war; and as Nicias of all the Athenians moſt vigorouſly promoted it, ſo from him it was called the Nician peace [d].

THE

[d] Thucyd. lib. v. Diodor. ubi ſupra. Plut. in vit. Niciæ.

THE quiet of Greece was far from being restored on the cessation of the war, such of the states in Peloponnesus as were not satisfied with the terms of peace began to intrigue and negotiate amongst themselves, and to endeavour to set on foot a new confederacy, the head of which was to be the state of Argos. The pretence was, that the liberty of Greece was in danger from the alliance between Sparta and Athens, and as a proof of this they alledged an article in that alliance, whereby it was provided, that by mutual consent new conditions might be added thereto, or any of the old ones altered at their pleasure. In the mean time, the Spartans found it not in their power to perform exactly the terms of their treaty with Athens; for whereas it was stipulated, that all places taken should be restored, Amphipolis absolutely refused to return under the Athenian government, so that all the Lacedæmonians could do was, to withdraw their garison, and under the colour of this, the Athenians on their side refused to evacuate Pylus. The Lacedæmonians pressing earnestly to have this fortress put into their hands, or that at least the Helotes and Messenians might be removed from thence, the Athenians were at last prevailed on to grant the latter, and to send those who were thus removed from Pylus to the island of Cephalenia. In the winter new negotiations were entered into on all sides, the Lacedæmonians sought to induce the Bœotians to give up Panactus and the Athenian prisoners, in hopes thereby to recover Pylus; with much ado they brought the Bœotians into this, but not till they had thoroughly destroyed the fortifications of the city in question; after which it was delivered up. The Athenians on their side had done every thing that could be expected from them, excepting only the rendering of Pylus, which they kept as a pledge for the Spartans complying with what they had undertaken in that alliance. The demolition of Panactus therefore gave them very great uneasiness, and induced them to apprehend the Lacedæmonians had circumvented them, and would in the end reconcile themselves to their old confederates at their expence. These discontents were heightened by the artifices of Alcibiades, who began now to rival Nicias, and who will make so considerable a figure in the subsequent part of this history, that there is a necessity of informing the reader who and what he was. In point of birth he yielded to none, he was the son of Clinias, the nephew of Pericles, and descended lineally lineally from Ajax; in his perſon he was ſo beautiful, that while a youth he was beloved, and when he grew up to be a man, he was revered for his extraordinary comelineſs; his fortune was large and beyond moſt of the nobility in Athens; as to his parts, Cornelius Nepos ſeems to have drawn his juſt character in ſaying, that nature in him had exerted her utmoſt force, ſince, whether we conſider his virtues or his vices, he was diſtinguiſhed from all his fellow-citizens. He was learned, eloquent, indefatigable, liberal, magnificent, affable, and knew exactly how to comply with the times, that is, he knew how to put on all thoſe virtues when he thought fit; for when he gave a looſe to his paſſions, he was indolent, luxurious, diſſolute, extremely addicted to women, intemperate, and inclined to prophaneneſs. It was a great advantage to him, that Socrates had a great friendſhip for him, or, as the Greeks ſtiled it, a love; for this not only corrected his manners and brought him to the knowledge of many things, of which otherwiſe he would have been ignorant, but alſo gave the Athenians hopes of him, and kept them from reſenting thoſe wanton acts of pride and vanity which he committed whilſt a lad; by his mother's ſide he was deſcended from the Alcmeonidæ, and his anceſtors by the father's ſide had been always upon good terms with the Lacedæmonians. Clinias had indeed diſclaimed his friendſhip with that people, but Alcibiades renewed his title to it, and affected to ſhew a mighty reſpect to Lacedæmonian ſtrangers. But when he obſerved the embaſſadors of that ſtate applied themſelves wholly to Nicias and his dependents; he reſented it ſo much, that he began inſtantly to work upon the people's mind to their prejudice, giving out, that the Lacedæmonians were not hearty in their laſt treaty, and that Nicias was more a friend to them than was conſiſtent with his duty to his country. In proof of the firſt, he alledged, that the Spartans were now takeing meaſures for humbling Argos and her Allies, that they might afterwards bring down Athens. As to the latter, he put his countrymen in mind of the coldneſs Nicias had ſhewn when they would have ſent him with a fleet to make a deſcent on Sphacteria; the iſſue of all this was, that the people began to entertain a diſtruſt both of their old general and of their new allies. Shortly after this came embaſſadors from Lacedæmon to court the Athenians, and to rectify their opinions as to the ſincerity of that ſtate; theſe miniſters at firſt applied themſelves to Nicias, who introduced them to the ſenate, where they declared they were veſted with full power to adjuſt all differences, and to add ſuch new clauſes to the treaty already ſubſiſting as might give ample ſatisfaction to the Athenians. When they retired from thence, Alcibiades, as the old friend of their nation, invited them to his houſe, where he expoſtulated with them on their attaching themſelves to Nicias, aſſured them of his friendſhip, and, as a proof thereof adviſed them to deny in the general aſſembly of the people that they were veſted with full powers, under pretence that the acknowledging thereof would induce the Athenians to extort unreaſonable compliances. When therefore the embaſſadors came into the forum, Alcibiades firſt ſtood up, and aſked them whether they had full powers, to which, according to agreement, they anſwered, No. Alcibiades turning to the people, ſaid, 'You ſee my countrymen, 'what credit ought to be given to theſe Lacedæmonians, 'who deny to you to day what they ſolemnly affirmed 'yeſterday to the ſenate!' The people upon this abſolutely refuſed to hear the Lacedæmons ſpeak. Alcibiades immediately afterwards recommended the cauſe of the Argives, Mantineans, and Eleans, who at that time ſought the friendſhip of Athens; but before they could come to a concluſion, an earthquake happened, which of courſe diſſolved the aſſembly. At the next meeting, Nicias propoſed, that he might be ſent embaſſador to Sparta before any harſh reſolutions were taken, which the aſſembly complied with; but when Nicias came to Lacedæmon, he found there a party as unreaſonable as that which he had left at Athens; for they would not give him any ſort of ſatisfaction with reſpect to his demands, and only ſwore anew to the old alliance, merely, that they might ſeem to do ſomething for the ſake of their old friend. Upon his return, the Athenians concluded a league with the Argives and the other ſtates before-mentioned for a hundred years, which Alcibiades who promoted it looked upon as a maſter-piece in politics, becauſe thereby he had provided a means to keep that war at a diſtance, in caſe the feuds between Sparta and Athens were revived, a thing which was much eaſier foreſeen than remedied. Such were the events of the eleventh and twelfth years after the commencement of this Peloponnesian war [e] (L).

[e] Thucyd. lib. v. Diodor. lib. xii. Plut. in vit. Niciæ & Alcibiad.

(L) We thought it necessary to insert here the league itself, as it stands in Thucydides, for many reasons; first, because it enlightens the history; secondly, for that it shews the policy of those times, and that the treaties of the ancient Greeks were no less perfect and explicit than ours; thirdly, that it might serve as an authority to demonstrate the truth and solidity of this history; thus it runs:

" The Athenians, and Argives, and Mantineans, and Eleans, " for themselves and for the confederates commanded by every " of them, have made an accord for a hundred years, without " fraud or damage, both by sea and land. It shall not be law- " ful for the Argives, nor Eleans, nor Mantineans nor their " confederates, to bear arms against the Athenians, or the con- " federates under the command of the Athenians or their con- " federates, by any fraud or machination whatsoever, and the " Athenians, Argives, and Mantineans have made league with " each other for a hundred years on these terms. If any " enemy shall invade the territory of the Athenians, then the " Argives, Eleans, and Mantineans shall go unto Athens to " assist them, according as the Athenians shall send them word " to do, in the best manner they possibly can. But if the ene- " my, after he have spoiled the territory shall be gone back, " then their city shall be held as an enemy to the Argives, " Eleans, Mantineans, and Athenians, and war shall be made " against it by all those cities, and it shall not be lawful for " any of those cities to give over the war without the con- " sent of all the rest. And if any enemy shall invade the ter- " ritory either of the Argives, or of the Eleans, or of the Man- " tineans, then the Athenians shall come into Argos, Elis, and " Mantinea to assist them, in such sort as those cities shall " send them word to do, in the best manner they possibly can. " But if the enemy, after he hath wasted their territory, shall " be gone back, then their city shall be held as an enemy " both to the Athenians and also to the Argives, Eleans, and " Mantineans, and war shall be made against it by all those " cities, and it shall not be lawful for any of them to give " over the war against that city without the consent of all " the rest. There shall no armed men be suffered to pass " through the dominions either of themselves, or of any the " confederates under their several commands, to make war in " any place whatsoever, unless by the suffrage of all the cities,

" Athens,

THE next ſummer, Alcibiades, at the head of a conſiderable army, paſſed over into the territory of Argos, and

" Athens, Argos, Elis, and Mantinea, their paſſage be allowed.
" To ſuch as come to aſſiſt any of the other cities, that city " which ſendeth them ſhall give maintenance for thirty days
" after they ſhall arrive in the city that ſent for them, and the " like at their going away. But if they will uſe the army
" for a longer time, then the city that ſent for them, ſhall
" find them maintenance at the rate of three oboles of Ægina
" a day for a man-of-arms, and of a drachmæ of Ægina for a " horſeman. The city which ſendeth for the aids ſhall have " the leading and command of them, whilſt the war is in their " own territory: But if it ſhall ſeem good unto theſe cities to " make a war in common, then all the cities ſhall equally par" ticipate of the command. The Athenians ſhall ſwear unto
" the articles both for themſelves and for their confederates;
" and the Argives, Eleans, Mantineans, and the confederates of
" theſe, ſhall every one ſwear unto them, city by city, and " their oath ſhall be the greateſt that by cuſtom of the ſeveral " cities is uſed, and with moſt perfect hoſts, i. e. beaſts offered in " ſacrifice, and in theſe words:
" I will ſtand to this league according to the articles there-
" of, juſtly, innocently, and ſincerely, and not tranſgreſs the
" ſame by any art or machination whatſoever.
" This oath ſhall be taken at Athens by the ſenate and the " officers of the commons, and adminiſtred by the Prytanes.
" At Argos it ſhall be taken by the ſenate, and the council of " eighty, and by the Artynæ, and adminiſtred by the council " of eighty. At Mantinea it ſhall be taken by the procurators
" of the people, and by the ſenate, and by the reſt of the " magiſtrates, and adminiſtred by the theori and by the tri" bunes of the ſoldiers. At Elis it ſhall be taken by the pro-
" curators of the peeple and by the officers of the treaſury, and
" by the council of ſix hundred, and adminiſtred by the procu" rators of the people, and by the keepers of the laws. This
" oath ſhall be renewed by the Athenians, who ſhall go to Elis,
" and to Mantinea, and to Argos, thirty days before the olym" pian games, and by the Argives, Eleans, and Mantineans, who " ſhall come to Athens ten days before the Panathenæan holy" days. The articles of this league and peace, and the oath
" ſhall be inſcribed in a pillar of ſtone by the Athenians in the " citadel; by the Argives in the market-place within the pre" cinct of the temple of Apollo; and by the Mantineans, in " their market-place within the precinct of the temple of Ju" piter; and at the olympian games now at hand, there ſhall

" be

and from thence to Patræ; he laboured at both places to perſuade them to build walls to the ſea, that ſo they might the more eaſily receive aſſiſtance from the Athenians. The Patræans, thinking to ſhew their wiſdom and foreſight, expoſtulated with Alcibiades, telling him, that if they took his advice, the Athenians might in time ſwallow them up. I do not know anſwered he but they may, yet they muſt begin at the feet and eat you by degrees, whereas, if the Lacedæmonians are your enemies, they will begin at the head and devour you all at once. The Argives thought this year to have made themſelves maſters of Epidaurus, but were hindered by the Lacedæmonians putting a gariſon into it of three hundred men, whereupon the Athenians brought back the Helotes and Meſſenians, and reſettled them in Pylus; thus all the preparatives for war were made this year, which was the thirteenth after the beginning of that ſtiled the Peloponneſian, yet no action was undertaken therein [f].

THE next ſummer, the Spartans drew together a very great army, which, under the command of Agis their king, entered the territory of Argos, where the confederate army lay; but as the engagement was about to begin, a truce was ſuddenly clapped up by two of the Argive generals and the king of Lacedæmon, for which none of them received thanks, but, on the contrary, were extremely ill treated by their reſpective citizens. Some ſhort time after, an Athenian army, conſiſting of a thouſand foot and three hundred horſe, arrived at Argos, whereupon the Argives renounced the truce with Lacedæmon and began the war again. The Athenian troops were commanded by Paches and Nicoſtratus, but Alcibiades was in it as a volunteer without command; he it was who perſuaded the Argives to beſiege Orchomenus, and ſoon after Tegea; but the career of their victories was ſoon ſtopped, for Agis king of Sparta, at the head of a great

[f] Thucyd. Diodor. Plut. ubi ſupra.

" be erected jointly by them all a brazen pillar in olympia
" (with the ſame inſcription). If it ſhall ſeem good to theſe
" cities to add any thing to theſe articles, whatſoever ſhall be " determined by them all in common council, the ſame ſhall
" ſtand good (92)."

(92) Thucyd. de Bell. Pelop. lib. v.

army, came to give them battle: it was fought in the neighbourhood of Mantinea, and is very accurately deſcribed by Thucydides; in it the Argives and their confederates were at firſt victorious in one wing, but the Lacedæmonians prevailing in the center and in the other wing afterwards, hemmed in the Argives, and defeated them alſo, gaining thereby a glorious victory, in right of which they erected a trophy. The Eleans and Athenians, however, after this battle inveſted Epidaurus, and threw up intrenchments around it; in the winter a ſtrong party in Argos joining with the Lacedæmonians, that city broke off her league with Athens, and renewed it with Sparta for fifty years; in conſequence of which the Argives aboliſhed democracy, which hitherto had ſubſiſted in their city, and to compliment their new allies, not only ſet up an ariſtocracy among themſelves, but aſſiſted the Lacedæmonians with a conſiderable body of troops, to force the Sicyonians upon the ſame meaſure; thus ended the fourteenth year of the Peloponneſian war, which was now opened again with circumſtances more dangerous than before.

In the very next ſummer, Argos changed her party again, for falling into an early diſlike of an ariſtocracy, which to thoſe who were free before ſeemed little better than a tyranny, they fell upon the Lacedæmonians in their city, and upon ſuch of their own citizens as they thought were of their own party, and having killed ſome and baniſhed others, they renounced their new-made league with Sparta, and renewed their old one with Athens. They likewiſe began to follow the advice which Alcibiades had given them, and with indefatigable induſtry wrought on the long walls which were neceſſary to join their city with the ſea. The Athenians, in the mean time, being convinced that Perdiccas king of Macedonia had betrayed them, and been the chief occaſion that their expeditions againſt the Chalcidians and the city of Amphipolis had miſcarried, renounced their league with him, and declared war againſt him. Theſe were the events of the fifteenth year [g].

Alcibiades at the beginning of the next year came with a fleet of twenty ſhips into the territories of Argos, to aſſiſt his friends and to put an end to the diſputes which reigned in that city; in order thereto, he cauſed three hundred hundred of the inhabitants, who were ſuſpected of favouring the Lacedæmonians, to be ſeized and carried away; after which they ſailed to the iſland of Melos, which, though but ſmall and of inconſiderable force, had always acted with inflexible obſtinacy againſt the Athenians; the general contented himſelf with beſieging the capital, and when he found that the reduction thereof would be a work of time, he turned his ſiege into a blockade, and, leaving a conſiderable body of forces in his lines here, returned to Athens. Philocrates the ſon of Endemus, being afterwards ſent with ſupplies to the camp before Melos, reduced the place to ſuch diſtreſs, that the inhabitants yielded at diſcretion; whereupon the Athenians put every man who was able to bear arms to the ſword, and carried the women and children captives to Athens. Thucydides and Plutarch both mention this extraordinary act of ſeverity, but they differ pretty much with reſpect to the circumſtances attending it; Thucydides ſpeaks of this as the act of the general and his army, provoked by the obſtinate defence of the inhabitants of Melos; Plutarch ſays, it was done by virtue of a decree of the people of Athens, which, if it was not propoſed, was at leaſt promoted, by Alcibiades; Diodorus Siculus relates this fact alſo, but generally, and without any circumſtances at all. The Athenians from Pylus made various incurſions into Laconia, which the Lacedæmonians did not reſent as a breach of the peace, but gave leave only to their ſubjects to make repriſals on the Athenians. As to affairs in Macedonia, they received no very material alteration, except that the Athenians made ſome incurſions into the territories of king Perdiccas; theſe were the events of the ſixteenth year of the war [h].

[g] Thucyd. Diodor. & Plut. ubi ſupra.

THE Athenians determined in the beginning of this year to ſend a fleet and a great army into Sicily, the occaſion this; the Egeſtines, conceiving themſelves exceedingly ill treated by their countrymen, ſent to deſire aid from the Athenians; their embaſſadors arrived the year before, but as no reſolution was taken, or at leaſt put in execution, till now, we thought it proper to give the whole ſtory at once. Alcibiades and his faction were of opinion that this was a very happy conjuncture, and that the Athenians ought readily to embrace an opportunity of conquering Sicily; for with them to invade and to conquer were synonymous terms, that from thence they might pass over to Afric, and reduce Carthage and Lybia under their dominion; after which they intended to conquer Italy. People of sense saw the madness of these schemes, but durst not oppose them; Nicias alone, though he was held the most timorous man in Athens, had the courage to oppose both the nobility and the people, and to set all things forth in their true light. He said, that Athens had already as much work upon her hands as she could do, that a breach with Sparta was inevitable, that the war must of consequence be carried on in all parts of Greece, and that fleets and armies sufficient for this purpose would try the utmost strength of Athens. That Sicily was not so easy a conquest as many apprehended, since it was a very populous island, and its inhabitants remarkable both for prudence and valour. That the Carthaginians, who were by far more powerful than the Athenians, had in vain attempted to reduce this island, and that in case the Athenians could prevail, it would be found no easy task to preserve their conquest against the united power of the Sicilians and all their other enemies in Greece. His discourse, however, had no manner of weight, the Athenians, deluded by their own embassadors, who reported strange things of the wealth of the Egestines, decreed, that a fleet should be sent to their assistance with a land-army on board, naming Nicias for the general, and giving him Alcibiades and Lamachus for his collegues. Nothing could give greater uneasiness to any man, than this nomination did to Nicias, he represented the expence of the war, in hopes that it might deter his countrymen from engaging in it, but in vain; they cut off all objections of that sort, by giving the generals absolute authority to do whatever seemed to them most proper for the service of the state. While these preparations were making, an accident happened which put the whole city in confusion; the Hermæ, i. e. the statues of Mercury, of which there were a multitude in and about the city, were all of them defaced in one night; nor could the authors of this fact be discovered, notwithstanding a proclamation offering impunity and reward to the informer; yet, in consequence of a clause therein, inviting any person, of what condition soever, to discover former sacrileges, some servants and slaves deposed,

[h] Thucyd. Diodor. Plut. ubi ſupra.

depoſed, that a long time before, certain young men, heated with wine, had ridiculed ſome religious myſteries, and that Alcibiades was amongſt them; his enemies, catching at this, commenced a proſecution againſt him, to which Alcibiades readily offered to anſwer, aſſerting his innocence, and proteſting againſt accuſations brought in his abſence; but his enemies, being determined to deſtroy him, procured others to move, that for the preſent he ſhould have licence to depart on his command, and that after his return a day of trial ſhould be aſſigned him; to which propoſition he very unwillingly was forced to accede. The fleet equipped on this occaſion conſiſted of a hundred gallies, but they were better provided than any the Athenians had ever ſent to ſea before, and when joined by their allies at Corcyra, made up a hundred and thirty-four gallies; of heavy-armed troops there were five thouſand one hundred, of which fifteen hundred were Athenian volunteers. This great fleet ſtayed ſome time at Corcyra in order to ſend ſome light frigates to the coaſt of Sicily, and to take proper meaſures with their allies for the debarkment of the forces. At Corcyra the generals differed, Nicias, who never had any opinion of the war, finding that their confederates were far leſs powerful than they had been repreſented, inclined to ſend only a ſquadron of ſixty ſhips to their relief. Alcibiades alledged, that it would be highly diſhonourable for the Athenians, after fitting out a fleet at ſuch an immenſe expence, to content themſelves with ſending only a part of it to perform what the whole was deſigned for; Lamachus differed in opinion from them both, he ſaid, that, their allies being no longer to be depended on, they ought now to conſider what could be done againſt their enemies; and as an army was always moſt terrible at firſt, before the minds of the ſoldiers were diſcouraged by hardſhips and fatigues, he gave his vote for ſailing directly for Syracuſe, landing their troops as near it as poſſible, and giving the enemy battle under their own walls; at laſt, however, he came over to the opinion of Alcibiades, after which the fleet ſailed for Sicily, where the army was landed, and with much ado took poſſeſſion of Catana; from thence they made ſome excurſions, but with little ſucceſs. But long they had not been in this iſland before orders from Athens arrived, directing Alcibiades to return and abide his trial, the city being all in an uproar on the old affair of defacing the Mercuries. It was a ſtate-trick play'd

off

off by the enemies of Alcibiades to ruin the mighty intereſt he had in Athens; to the ſame end they gave out, that he had entered into a conſpiracy to betray the city to the Lacedæmonians, and that he had purſued the Argives to undertake ſomething to their prejudice. It was therefore determined to put him to death upon his return, but it being apprehended, that the cauſing him to be arreſted in ſight of his army mighty produce great commotions therein, thoſe who were ſent to bring him home were ordered to treat him with great decency, and not to diſcover by any means the ſevere reſolution taken againſt him. They executed their commiſſion very exactly, ſo that Alcibiades and thoſe of his army, who were accuſed as well as he, had not any ſuſpicion; but in the courſe of their voyage, gathering from the ſeamen ſomewhat of what was intended, and being informed, that a perſon out of fear of death had acknowledged himſelf guilty and impeached them, they wiſely determined not to truſt an enraged and ſuperſtitious multitude, but to provide for their own ſafety, by withdrawing as ſoon as they had an opportunity; which offering itſelf quickly after, they gave their convoy the ſlip, and retired to ſuch parts of Greece, as, out of hatred to the Athenians, were moſt like to give them ſhelter; as for Alcibiades, he afterwards went to Sparta, and was well received there. The army in Sicily took this proceeding very heavily, however, the command devolving on Nicias, he managed it the beſt he could, as well for the ſake of his own honour, as from the apprehenſions he was under of being accuſed, in caſe any accident happened; for, having a juſt idea of the temper of his countrymen, he dreaded above all things a proſecution before the people, who heard accuſations willingly, and believed the moſt juſt defences but ſlowly. By a ſtratagem he and his collegue Lamachus brought their army near Syracuſe, and afterwards engaged the inhabitants of that city to make a ſally, wherein they ſuffered ſome loſs, and grew in great fear of an enemy whom hitherto they had in a manner deſpiſed; the Athenians, however, retired, and took their winter-quarters at Catana. In the interim the Syracuſans, by the advice of Hermocrates, ſent deputations to Sparta and Corinth to deſire aid againſt the Athenians, while themſelves wrought hard in repairing the fortifications of their city, and in laying waſte the country in the neighbourhood of the Athenian camp. The moderation of Nicias and the complacency of Lamachus, a well-diſpoſed man and an excellent officer, officer, but little eſteemed by the Athenian people becauſe he was poor, drew many of the cities of Sicily to ſide with them, ſo that at laſt the iſland was divided into two factions, the one friends, the other enemies, to the ſtate of Athens; as for the Syracuſans, who were at the head of the latter, they depended chiefly on the ſuccours they had demanded from Greece; the Corinthians readily promiſed and ſent them aſſiſtance, and alſo ſent embaſſadors to Sparta to co-operate with thoſe whom the Syracuſans had ſent thither; but the Spartans, not caring to offend the Athenians further, heſitated much at their propoſitions, till Alcibiades informed them of the Athenian deſigns; then they diſpatched Gylippus with a ſmall body of troops to aſſiſt the Syracuſans, and at the ſame time determined to renew the war with Athens and to invade Attica itſelf; this was the firſt ſtep to the ruin of Athens, for by the perſuaſion of the ſame perſon they determined to fortify Decelea a caſtle in Attica, which hindered the inhabitants of Athens from returning from their farms when the enemy was withdrawn, cut off their ſupplies from their ſilver mines at Laurium, and ſerved as a receptacle for all the malecontents, and indeed for all the banditti in the neighbourhood. It is ſtrange, that this was never thought of before, and that it ſhould be reſolved on now at the recommendation of Alcibiades, who in a ſhort time had gained as great or greater credit at Sparta than he had ever at Athens. He procured this confidence by addicting himſelf to their cuſtoms, by conforming to them in his dreſs and manner of living, and in ſhort by throwing off every thing which ſeemed to ſpeak him an Athenian, and going more heartily than any of the Lacedæmonians themſelves did into ſuch meaſures as had a direct tendency to their deſtruction. Towards the end of the year, the army in Sicily being much weakened, the generals ſent to demand a ſupply of money and horſemen, which the Athenians readily decreed; this was the ſeventeenth year after the commencement of the Peloponneſian war [i].

Nicias, having received the ſuccours he demanded, ſailed to Syracuſe, where he had ſeveral rencounters with the townſmen, but had the better of them in all; the Athenian fleet ſailing into the haven of Syracuſe, a very briſk action happened, in which Lamachus was killed; after which Nicias,

[i] Thucyd. lib. vi. Diodor. lib. xiii. Plut. vit. Alcibiad. & Niciæ.

Nicias, cauſing new works to be thrown up before the place, ſtreightned the Syracuſans ſo much, that they thought of capitulating, but in the interim Gylippus with his Spartan ſuccours arrived. In Greece, the Athenians, in ſupport of their allies the Argives, invaded the territory of Epidaurus, and thereby openly broke the truce which had hitherto, though in a doubtful manner, ſubſiſted between them and the Lacedæmonians. Gylippus, by dint of conduct, defeated the deſigns of Nicias againſt Syracuſe, who notwithſtanding began to form new projects, and to exert his utmoſt ſkill, though in a very bad ſtate of health, for furthering the Athenian affairs in that iſland. New ſupplies were in the mean time decreed to him at Athens, Demoſthenes and Eurymedon being joined in commiſſion with him, the latter ſailed in the midſt of winter with ten gallies and a great ſum of money into Sicily; Demoſthenes remained behind, being employed in providing all things neceſſary for a great fleet, which was to be ſent thither in the ſpring. A ſmall one in the mean time, conſiſting of twenty gallies, was ſent to cruize on the coaſt of Peloponneſus, and theſe were all the remarkable things which happened in the eighteenth year of the war [k].

Early in the ſpring, Agis king of Sparta, at the head of a very numerous army of Lacedæmonians, Corinthians, and other nations of Peloponneſus, invaded Attica, and, according to the advice which Alcibiades had given, ſeized, and fortified Decelea, which ſtood at an equal diſtance from Athens and the frontiers of Bœotia. In the mean time, the Athenians ſeemed leſs concerned for their own ſafety than for their conqueſts in Sicily; for they ordered a fleet of thirty ſhips to be equipped for ſpoiling the coaſts of Peloponneſus, at the ſame time that they ſent Demoſthenes with ſixty of their own gallies and five belonging to the iſland of Chios to ſupport Nicias, and to carry on effectually the war againſt the Syracuſans, who about this time received a powerful ſuccour from the Peloponneſians. When Demoſthenes arrived, he found things in a very declining way, Nicias having ſome time before ſuſtained ſome loſs at ſea, wherewith himſelf and his army were much diſpirited, though it had been occaſioned chiefly by the warmth of other commanders, who paid too little regard to the general's orders. Demoſthenes, who commanded the ſupply, affected to cenſure Nicias's conduct, as if he had wanted

[k] Thucyd. Diodor. ubi ſupra.

wanted activity, and was not at all deſirous of carrying on the war; to ſhew therefore of how different a diſpoſition himſelf was, he would cauſe Epipolæ to be attacked, and that too in the night, which was accordingly done, but with very bad ſucceſs; for all ſpeaking the ſame language, they were unable to diſtinguiſh foe from friend, ſo that a mighty ſlaughter happened, which exceedingly weakened the Athenian fleet. Demoſthenes was then for ſailing away as faſt as poſſible, conceiving that, ſince himſelf could do nothing, there was nothing to be done in Sicily; Nicias on the contrary inſiſted poſitively on continuing the ſiege, Eurymedon joined with Demoſthenes, but Nicias could not be prevailed on to depart from his ſentiment; which was, that the Athenians, having once ſat down before a town, ought not to riſe without taking it. The true motive, however, to his obſtinate behaviour was his old apprehenſions of the people of Athens; he remembered how they baniſhed two generals for coming from Sicily before, though they had all the reaſon in the world for what they did; he choſe therefore to truſt fortune, ſickneſs, and the enemy, rather than the people of Athens. Yet when they received certain intelligence, that Gylippus, with a body of Spartans and other Peloponneſian troops, was arrived, Nicias agreed that it was fit to depart, and immediately thereupon orders were iſſued to the army; but juſt as they were ready to retire, an eclipſe of the moon happened, which terrified Nicias, who was a very ſuperſtitious man, ſo much, that he would needs keep the army there ſeven and twenty days longer. The Syracuſans, as ſoon as they were informed of this, attacked the Athenian camp, and provoked them to fight both by land and ſea. At laſt a naval engagement happened, in which Eurymedon was ſlain; and though Gylippus and his ſquadron were beaten, in conſequence of which the Athenians erected a trophy, yet they had apparently the worſt of it, ſince the Syracuſans and their allies immediately bent all their endeavours to ſhut them up in the port. Nicias and Demoſthenes, ſeeing the miſerable condition in which they were, concluded at laſt to draw their forces into a ſmaller camp nearer their ſhips, that they might be at hand to aſſiſt each other; and when this was done, they reſolved to venture another engagement at ſea, in hopes of breaking through; but in caſe they were ſo unfortunate as to fail therein, they determined with themſelves to burn their veſſels, and to march over land to Catana; according to this reſolution they attacked tacked the Syracusans in the mouth of the haven with wonderful bravery and resolution, the land armies being spectators on both sides. This was the most bloody battle, and by far the most obstinate which the Athenians had ever fought; in it they sunk and burnt many of the enemies fleet, but were themselves so much weakened, that though the generals resolved to hazard another engagement, yet the men absolutely refused to go on board, alledging, that it was impossible for them to undergo two services at once. It was thereupon determined to retire the next night by land, which if they had done, it is very probable they might have escaped; but being deceived by the industry of Hermocrates, they put it off till the third day after. Nicias with his troops led the van, Demosthenes brought up the rear, but the Syracusans pressed so hard upon them, that Demosthenes was forced to halt, whereupon he drew up his forces in order of battle; but, the Syracusans surrounding him, and many of his men beginning to desert, he thought fit to capitulate, and having stipulated that none of his men should be put to death on any pretence whatsoever, he and his troops to the number of six thousand yielded up their arms and became prisoners. The next day the Syracusans overtook Nicias, who thereupon encamped on an eminence, and disposed all things for making the best defence he could; Gylippus immediately sent to inform him that Demosthenes had surrendered, and advised him to do the like, which he refused; but he offered to give hostages for the repayment of the expence of the war to the Syracusans, if they would suffer him and his army to retire; but this was refused him, whereupon he continued his march fighting as he went, till he arrived at the river Asinarus, where the soldiers, throwing themselves in without any order, miserably destroyed each other, and were at the same time killed without mercy by the enemy, so that they perished by hundreds, without making any effort for their lives. Nicias himself surrendered to Gylippus. When the Syracusans returned to the city, the Sicilians pressed violently to have the generals put to death, which the Lacedæmonians, and especially Gylippus, opposed as much as they were able, out of generosity with regard to Demosthenes, who was the most bitter enemy of the Spartans, and who, as we have before shewn, projected the seizing of Pylus; out of gratitude with respect to Nicias, who had ever been a friend to Lacedæmon, and who had been the chief author of the peace. At last, if we may believe Thucydides, dides, the Syracuſans prevailed, and Nicias and Demoſthenes were put to death. Plutarch ſays, they killed themſelves in priſon (M). Of the ſoldiers, who were made priſoners,

(M) The character and ſervices of Nicias are ſufficiently ſettled in the text; here therefore we ſhall ſpeak only of his misfortunes, which were derived from the fear of the people and his ſuperſtition; he carried with him into Sicily one Stilbides a philoſopher, who had weaned him from many of his follies, and had poſſibly ſaved him at laſt, if he had lived; but happening to die ſometime before the laſt defeat at Syracuſe, Nicias had no body about him who could account for an eclipſe of the moon; for as to eclipſes of the ſun, Pericles had put their being ominous out of every body's head by an action mentioned in note K. In their laſt retreat, Nicias in the midſt of his misfortunes behaved with the greateſt dignity and compoſure; after he was taken priſoner, perceiving that the Syracuſans continued ſtill to maſſacre his ſoldiers, though they were abſolutely in their power; he threw himſelf at the feet of Gylippus, whom he addreſſed in theſe words: In the midſt of victory, O Gylippus, ſuffer yourſelf to be touched with pity, not of me, whom an exceſs of miſery has made famous, but of thoſe unhappy Athenians. Conſider, that fortune is never ſo changeable as in war, and do not forget how the Athenians, whenever they got the better of the Lacedæmonians, always uſed their victories with moderation and generoſity. The Lacedæmonian, moved at this, raiſed up Nicias, and gave orders that the ſlaughter ſhould ceaſe, but thoſe orders were very indifferently obeyed, many hundreds being killed afterwards. Authors differ exceedingly about the melancholy cataſtrophe of this great man. Thucydides ſays, that the Syracuſans, againſt Gylippus's will, put Nicias and Demoſthenes to death, or, as the word literally ſignifies, cut their throats. Plutarch tells us, that one Timæus wrote, that Hermocrates ſent the generals word that the Syracuſans would put them to death, and that thereupon they ſlew themſelves. Diodorus Siculus is ſtill wider from Thucydides than any of the reſt, for he makes Gylippus the author of their death, againſt the will of the wiſeſt of the Syracuſans, and has inſerted an oration of his to that purpoſe. Juſtin from Trogus Pompeius ſays, that Demoſthenes ſlew himſelf, but that Nicias ſubmitted, and was made priſoner; undoubtedly Thucydides deſerves moſt credit; with his account of the matter therefore we will cloſe this note: "Nicias and Demoſthenes they killed againſt Gylipus's "will. For Gylippus thought the victory would be very honour-"able, if, over and above all his other ſucceſs, he could carry "home both the generals of the enemy to Lacedæmon. And it "fell out, that one of them, Demoſthenes, was their greateſt "enemy, ſoners, numbers were put to death, many ſent to work in the quarries, and a very few returned by ſtealth to the ſea-ports, and from thence made their eſcapes to Athens. This was the end of the Sicilian war, wherein the Athenians loſt not the conqueſt they aimed at, or that reputation which they had ſo long maintained, but their fleet, their army, and their generals. When advice of theſe loſſes came to Athens, they were for a long time not believed; but when the thing could be no longer doubted of, they grew very angry with thoſe who had adviſed the war, and with ſuch as had pretended to publiſh prophecies and oracles in favour of it; they reſolved, however, to take all neceſſary meaſures for ſupporting the dignity of the ſtate, to leave the adminiſtration of affairs to grave and wiſe perſons, to live with great frugality at home, and to treat their confederates better abroad; the expediency of theſe reſolutions appeared ſuddenly, for as ſoon as the news of the defeat in Sicily was ſpread throughout Greece, all ſuch as had been confederates with Athens began to ſhew their diſlike of her, while the Lacedæmonians were preparing by all means whatſoever to carry on the war with greater vigour than before. The Athenians cauſed the promontory of Sunium to be fortified with all diligence, cut down vaſt quantities of timber, and wrought hard to equip a new fleet, with which preparations ended the nineteenth year of the Peloponneſian war.

" enemy, for the things he had done in the iſland and at Pylus;
" and the other upon the ſame occaſion their greateſt friend. For " Nicias had greatly laboured to have thoſe priſoners which were " taken in the iſland to be ſet at liberty, by perſuading the Athe" nians to peace: For which cauſe the Lacedæmonians were in" clined to love him. And it was principally in confidence of " that, that he rendered himſelf to Gylippus. But certain Sy-" racuſans (as it is reported) ſome of them for fear (becauſe they " had been tampering with him) left being put to the torture he " might bring them into trouble, whereas they were now well " enough; and others (eſpecially the Corinthians) fearing he " might get away, by corruption of one or other (being wealthy),
" and work them ſome miſchief afreſh, having perſuaded their " confederates to the ſame, killed him. For theſe, or for cauſes " near unto theſe, was he put to death, being the man, that of " all the Grecians of my time had leaſt deſerved to be brought to
" ſo great a degree of miſery (93)".

(93) Thucyd. lib. vii. prop. fin. Diodor. lib. xiii. Plut. in vit. Nic. Juſtin. lib. iv. c. v.

In the beginning of the next year, the Chians ſought to revolt from Athens, and to put themſelves under the protection of the Lacedæmonians, with a view to which they ſent privately embaſſadors to the latter, who, in concert with their allies, promiſed to ſend ſuch a fleet as might protect them; but this promiſe was eaſier made than kept, and beſides, the Athenians got notice of it in the meantime, and ſent a fleet to Chios. The general of this fleet reproached the inhabitants of that iſland with their perfidy, which they ſtifly denied, and indeed the greater part of the people of Chios knew nothing of what had been tranſacted with the Lacedæmonians. But the Athenian general, to put the buſineſs out of diſpute, inſiſted, that they ſhould ſend their quota to join the fleet of Athens, whereupon they were conſtrained to fit out immediately ſeven gallies, and to ſend them as he directed. After this the Athenians had ſeveral ſmall ſucceſſes at ſea, which not a little diſcouraged the Peloponneſians, who would ſhortly have loſt all their reſolution, if Alcibiades had not exerted his eloquence to perſuade them to carry on the war. He adviſed them to ſend him with a ſmall fleet to Ionia, where he promiſed to engage the cities to revolt from the Athenians, and to negotiate a league between Sparta and the great king, from whence he aſſured them, that ſuch advantages would be derived as muſt effectually ſink their rival. The Lacedæmonians coming at laſt into his meaſures, he paſſed over, as he had propoſed, into Ionia, and there actually effected a great part of what he had promiſed, which ſtruck the Athenians with ſuch a panic, that they inſtantly ordered a thouſand talents, which had hitherto been reſerved untouched, to be laid out in the ſervice of the war, for which alſo they made other great preparations. As ſoon as they were able they ſent ſeveral ſquadrons of ſhips to ſea, with directions to reduce, firſt of all, ſuch places as had revolted, and then to act generally againſt the Peloponneſians; moſt of theſe ſquadrons were ſucceſsful, ſo that Leſbos, Clazomene, and other places, which, upon the proſpect of the downfal of Athens, had revolted from her, were conſtrained to fall under her dominion again. Alcibiades in the mean time acquitted himſelf well to the Lacedæmonians, by drawing Tiſſaphernes the king of Perſia's lieutenant into a league with them. The Spartans, however, were diſpleaſed with the terms thereof, and ſought to have them altered, which gave the Perſians much diſtaſte. The hatred which Agis had conceived againſt Alcibiades, for debauching his wife, began now to produce terrible effects; for he perſuaded the Lacedæmonians to ſend orders to their general in Ionia to put the Athenian to death, notwithſtanding all the ſervice he had done their ſtate. Alcibiades, gaining ſome intelligence of this, retired to Tiſſaphernes, and laying aſide the Lacedæmonian, as he had formerly done the Athenian, he became now a perfect Perſian; and, by the politeneſs of his addreſs, gained ſo much on Tiſſaphernes, who was a profeſſed enemy to the Greeks, that he ſtiled his gardens of pleaſure, after he had been at vaſt expence in adorning them, Alcibiades, by which name they went ever afterwards. When the Athenian perceived, that Tiſſaphernes placed a mighty confidence in him, he gave him a juſt light into the affairs of Greece; he told him, it was not for the intereſt of the Perſian king that Athens ſhould be deſtroyed, but, on the contrary, that ſhe and Sparta might be maintained as rivals to each other, that the Greeks might never have an opportunity of turning their arms upon his maſter; but if it ſhould at any time be found convenient to rely upon one of them, he adviſed him to truſt Athens, becauſe ſhe would be content with the dominion of the ſea; whereas the pride of the Spartans would always inſtigate them to new conqueſts, and eſpecially excite a deſire of ſetting all the Greek cities at liberty. For the preſent he put them upon detaining a part of the pay which had been promiſed to the Peloponneſian ſeamen, that they might thereby be kept in dependence, as alſo to countermand the order given to the Phœnician fleet to join that of Peloponneſus. When Tiſſaphernes had given into theſe councils, Alcibiades privately wrote to ſome of the officers of the Athenian army which lay at Samos, intimating, that he was now treating with the Perſian on their behalf, adding, that he cared not to return to his country till the democracy was aboliſhed. The reaſon offered by him to engage the Athenians to this proceeding, was, that the Perſian king liked not a democracy, but would immediately truſt and aſſiſt Athens, if the government was put into the hands of a few. Phrynicus the Athenian general, having a great antipathy to Alcibiades, and dreading his return, reſolved to let nothing ſlip which might prevent it; he therefore not only gave his opinion againſt the propoſition which Alcibiades had made, but alſo diſcovered it to Aſtyochus who commanded the Lacedæmonian troops; this man, being brought over to the intereſt of Tiſſaphernes, revealed Phrynicus's treachery; Alciabiades upon this wrote again to his correſpondents at Samos, charging their general with treachery, and betraying his country. Phrynicus, when he had information of this, wrote a ſecond time to Aſtyochus, reproaching him with betraying him and diſcovering what he had formerly acquainted him with in confidence, and offered him notwithſtanding to betray the army he commanded at Samos, which lay in an open town, to the Lacedæmonians; which piece of intelligence Aſtyochus inſtantly revealed to Alcibiades. Phrynicus being aware of this, told his ſoldiers, that the Lacedæmonians were about to attack them by land and ſea, and that therefore they ſhould throw up with all diligence a ſtrong intrenchment round the town to defend themſelves, which immediately they did, ſo that, when Alcibiades wrote again concerning Phrynicus's ſecond treachery, his letters were diſbelieved, becauſe the general had taken ſuch care for their ſafety. Such were the chieftains of Greece in theſe times, how unlike thoſe who broke the power of Perſia, and abandoned their country rather than live in it in a ſtate of dependence? the Athenians, always prone to novelty, on the arrival of Piſander and the other deputies from the army, who brought with them the propoſitions of Alcibiades, diſſolved the democracy, in defence of which they had ſo often and bravely fought, or rather reſolved to diſſolve it, for it ſtood yet a ſmall time. The iſſue of their preſent debates was, that Piſander with ten deputies ſhould return and treat with Alcibiades and Tiſſaphernes, that it might be known on what terms the king of Perſia's friendſhip might be depended on; and in caſe they were reaſonable to declare, that the Athenians would veſt the ſovereignty in the hands of a few. But before their arrival Alcibiades diſcovered, that Tiſſaphernes did not incline to help the Athenians at preſent on any terms, becauſe they had been lately ſucceſsful, and Alcibiades himſelf had taught him to help always the weaker party; when Alcibiades perceived this, he ſet up ſuch high demands in the name of the Perſian, that the Athenians themſelves broke off the treaty, whereby he preſerved both their friendſhip and that of Tiſſaphernes. When Piſander and his collegues came to the army at Samos, they engaged them to favour the ſcheme for the alteration of government, and procured a commiſſion to themſelves to overturn all the democratic governments that were under the dominion of Athens. When they came back to the city, they found their confederates had almoſt done their work without them, partly by cajoling the people, and partly by privately taking off, or in plain terms aſſaſſinating, ſuch as were ſtanch friends to the people. It was at firſt propoſed, that only the dregs of the people ſhould loſe their authority, which was to be veſted in five thouſand of the moſt wealthy, who were for the future to be reputed the people; but when Piſander and his aſſociates found the ſtrength of their party, they determined to carry matters further, and to erect an oligarchy. In the mean time, Oropus, a ſtrong city on the borders of Bœotia, revolted from the Athenians, whereby all Eubœa was in danger, the inhabitants thereof being deſirous to revolt, and the diſturbances at Athens giving them hopes to do it with impunity. In the mean time, the twentieth year ended of the Peloponneſian war [k].

to

When Piſander and his aſſociates firſt came from the army, they accuſed Phrynicus to the Athenians, and procured him to be recalled; he was a man of conſummate parts and prudence, and, according to Thucydides, as honeſt as the iniquities of the times would permit. On his return, finding the temper of the people, he became an enemy to democracy, in hopes that, if he had a hand in ſettling an oligarchy, Alcibiades would be afraid to truſt it; there was likewiſe at Athens one Antiphon, a man of ſuch mighty parts and eloquence, that the people were afraid of him to ſuch a degree, that he was conſtrained to avoid ſpeaking in public, and to manage his concerns by other hands; this man deviſed a new frame of government, and having communicated it to Piſander, they contrived together a method whereby to eſtabliſh it. With this view the latter, who was become very popular, propoſed, that ten men ſhould be elected with full power to frame, model, and alter laws; this being done, theſe ten appointed an aſſembly of the people at Colonus, a place without the city. When they came together there, inſtead of propoſing to them a body of laws, they offered them only this one, That every Athenian might ſpeak his mind freely, i. e. without danger from any of the laws; which being aſſented to, Piſander produced his ſcheme, which was, that the old form of government ſhould be diſſolved, and that five Prytanes might be elected; that theſe five ſhould chuſe a hundred; that each of the hundred ſhould chuſe three; that the four hundred thus elected elected ſhould become a ſenate with ſupreme power, and ſhould conſult the five thouſand only, when and on ſuch matters as they thought fit. Here was an end of the old government of Athens, which was grown into diſlike with the people, who were notwithſtanding not over-fond of the new; but thoſe who were for it, being ſuch as were men of great parts, found means to eſtabliſh it by force; for when the people were gone out of the city to their ordinary employments, the four hundred, having each a dagger concealed under his veſt, attended by a guard of a hundred and twenty men, entered ſuddenly into the ſenate-houſe, diſſolved the old ſenate, paid them their ſalary, and turned them out, which once effected, the commons were conſtrained to ſubmit, not knowing what to do, or to whom to apply. The new ſenate choſe Prytanes, or preſidents out of their own body, and began to eſtabliſh themſelves after the mode of moſt new governments, by blood, bonds, and baniſhment; yet theſe ſeverities, though they were illegal, were not exceſſive, and, as ſoon as their enemies were removed, the four hundred ruled gently enough. They ſent embaſſadors to Agis, who lay with the Lacedæmonian army at Decelea, to acquaint him that they were ready to treat of a peace, and that the Spartans might better rely on them than on the democracy; but Agis was of another opinion, he could not imagine that the Athenians, who had ſtickled ſo much for democracy, would ſubmit patiently to an oligarchy, eſtabliſhed rather through the arts of a few, than according to the general inclination of the citizens; he therefore gave no anſwer to the embaſſadors ſent by the four hundred, but having ſignified his thoughts of the matter to the Lacedæmonians, procured a great recruit to be ſent him into Attica. On the arrival of theſe ſuccours, he marched boldly to Athens, not at all queſtioning, but that the enemies of the oligarchy would raiſe a ſedition on his approach, and either ſubvert the government, or ſo weaken and diſtract the city, that the Lacedæomonians might eaſily take it; but he was quickly convinced of his miſtake, for the people of Athens when he approached their walls, and ſent ſome advance-parties to ſkirmiſh with them, attacked and routed thoſe parties, and appeared afterwards before their city with ſuch order and intrepidity, that Agis, after receiving ſome loſs, was conſtrained to retire again to his old poſt, from whence he ſent back the laſt forces he received to La-cedæmon. After this the four hundred ſent embaſſadors to him again, concerning whoſe negotiations we can ſay nothing, except that they were treated with greater civility than before. The four hundred, knowing well that the army at Samos were generally inclined to democracy, ſent ten deputies thither to appeaſe them, by perſuading them, that the government, now ſubſiſting at Athens, was only the beſt ſort of democracy, the dernier reſort not being in the four hundred, but in the five thouſand, a larger number than had ever aſſembled while the power was in the people; but theſe deputies were hardly gone from Athens before deputies of the army arrived there, ſignifying, that they had reſtored the democracy at Samos, and that they were reſolved to adhere to that form of government, for which the four hundred ſent ſome of theſe deputies to priſon; but one Carias who came from the army made his eſcape and got thither again, making a frightful report of the ſtate of things at Athens; upon which a ſedition enſued, that might have been very fatal to the ſtate; but moderate men interpoſing, the generals Thraſybulus and Thraſyllus contented themſelves with taking an oath of all the ſoldiers to do their utmoſt to reſtore the power to the people, to fight againſt the Peloponneſians and other enemies of Athens, and never to yield obedience to, or have any correſpondence with, the four hundred. They greatly encouraged their forces to be ſteady in the meaſures they had taken, by repreſenting to them, that they had not deſerted their city, but their city them; that their ſtrength was ſuperior to any that could be ſent againſt them by the four hundred, and that queſtionleſs on the public faith Alcibiades would come to them, and procure them aid from Tiſſaphernes and the king. Theſe diſcourſes had their effect, the ſoldiers came unanimouſly into all that was required of them, choſe new officers that might be depended on, and when their generals required it, went and offered battle to the Peloponneſians. At the requeſt of Thraſybulus they recalled Alcibiades, who, on his arrival, made a moſt eloquent ſpeech to the army, ſhewing them the true ſource of his misfortunes, the injuſtice of their countrymen, and the great danger of the ſtate. Above all things he magnified the power and good will of Tiſſaphernes, though he knew he had little authority for it, yet he could not be ſaid to deceive his countrymen, becauſe by this very method he compelled

[k] Thucyd. lib. vii. viii. Diodor. lib. xiii. Plut. vit. Nic. & Alcibiad. Corn. Nepos, vit. Alcibiad.

Tiſſaphernes

Tiſſaphernes to become their friend, inſtilling ſuch a ſpirit of jealouſy into the Peloponneſians, as made them no longer able to treat that lord either with confidence or civility. The ſoldiers, bewitched by his fine words, created him general with full power; and conceiving that with him they carried victory along with them, talked of nothing but ſailing directly to Athens, and reſtoring the ancient form of government there. Alcibiades oppoſed this extravagant meaſure, he told the ſoldiers, that, ſince they had choſen him their general, he muſt return to Tiſſaphernes, in order to diſpoſe things for the making a ſpeedy end of the war. The army came readily into this, as they did into every thing he deſired of them, and he departed accordingly; when he came to Tiſſaphernes, he gave him to underſtand, that matters were now quite changed, and that it was in the power of the Athenians to be either great friends, or very troubleſome enemies, to the ſubjects of the king, and that, whether they ſhould be either one or the other, depended entirely on his management. Thus he made himſelf formidable to the Perſians by boaſting of the Athenian power, and neceſſary to the Athenians by the diſplay of his intereſt with the Perſians. As to the Peloponneſians, their affairs went wrong every-where, and all through the procurement of Alcibiades; their army mutinied and forced their general to fly to a ſanctuary; Tiſſaphernes with-held their pay and deluded them with promiſes of a fleet; they on the other hand diſtruſted Tiſſaphernes, and neither knew what meaſures to take, nor whom to truſt. When Alcibiades came back to the Athenian army, he diſpoſed them to hear reaſon, and not only to hear it, but to act according to it. The deputies from Athens had ſtayed all this while at Delos, being afraid of going to the army, as indeed they well might, the ſoldiers having paſſed a vote to put them to death. On the motion of Alcibiades, however, they were allowed to come and deliver their meſſage; but no ſooner had they done this, than the army cried out as vehemently as ever, that they would have no intercourſe with the tyrants, but ſail to Athens and reſtore the government; but Alcibiades ſtill interpoſed, he ſhewed, that, if ſuch a courſe was taken, all Ionia and the Helleſpont would be immediately loſt, ſo that if they pretended to be true patriots, they muſt remain where they were and defend the dominions of the ſtate. To the deputies he gave this anſwer, that they ſhould immediately return to Athens, and acquaint the four hundred, that they were commanded to reſign their power and to reſtore the ſenate they had ejected; that as to the five thouſand, they might retain their authority, provided they uſed it with moderation, and that they ſhould remember to look well to the concerns of their country at home, ſince, if they betrayed Attica, or the army deſerted Athens, a reconciliation would not reſtore the miſchiefs ſuch wrong ſteps might create. On the return of theſe deputies to Athens, all things were in confuſion, few regarding the public, almoſt all anxious for their particular intereſt. Phrynicus, knowing upon what terms he ſtood with Alcibiades, laboured to maintain the government in being; while others endeavoured all they could to gratify the army. The former were the ſtronger party, and that they might make a proper uſe of their ſtrength, they diſpatched away embaſſadors to Sparta, deſiring peace upon any terms; they likewiſe ordered the Pyræum to be fortified towards the ſea, upon which Theramenes, who was at the head of the other party, cried out, that they were about to betray the city to the enemy, which was rendered the more probable, by the coming of a fleet of forty Peloponneſian ſhips upon the coaſt; nor was he much in the wrong, for the four hundred ſought firſt to maintain themſelves in the ſovereignty they had acquired; but if that could not be done, to preſerve at leaſt the city under their dominion; and in caſe that likewiſe failed, to make a compoſition for themſelves by giving it up to the Peloponneſians; for at all events they were reſolved to prevent a popular government from being reſtored, not doubting, that if once that was done, they ſhould fall victims. Phrynicus, who was ſent at the head of the embaſſy to Sparta, being able to affect nothing, returned, and on his return was ſtabbed in the forum; after which Theramenes and his party, growing bolder, ſeized the chiefs of the four hundred, upon which a tumult enſued, which had like to have proved fatal to the city, had not Thucydides the Pharſalian interpoſed, and engaged the people to be quiet. The ſoldiers, however, inſiſted on demoliſhing the new works in the port, which for the ſake of ſafety was permitted. The next day the four hundred, tho' in great fear, aſſembled in the ſenate-houſe, and ſent ſome of the members to appeaſe the people, promiſing to ſet all things right and to make every thing eaſy; in order to which they propoſed that they ſhould be allowed to chuſe five thouſand men, men, who ſhould elect four hundred by turns to govern the ſtate, beſeeching their countrymen not to deſtroy themſelves by giving up the city to the enemy. With much ado an agreement was made, that, at a day certain, a general aſſembly ſhould be convoked for ſettling the ſtate, but when that day came and the aſſembly was convened, news was brought, that the Lacedæmonian fleet ſteered directly for Salamis, which put all things in confuſion again; for, inſtead of deliberating upon the matter they came about, they ran in crouds down to the port, where they perceived that the fleet bore away for Eubœa, whither immediately a fleet from Athens was ſent under the command of Thymochares; but this fleet had little ſucceſs, for being attacked by the Peloponneſians without, and betrayed by the Eretrians on ſhore, they were miſerably defeated, twenty-two ſhips out of thirty-ſix being taken, moſt of the others deſtroyed and all Eubœa, except Oreus, revolting. When this news came to Athens, the wiſe and the unwiſe gave up all things for loſt, the defeat at Sicily ſeeming a ſmall thing to this, becauſe they had now neither fleet nor army, and had loſt Eubœa, from whence the city received greater ſupplies than from Attica itſelf; certain it is, that if the Spartans had known their own ſtrength, they would have ſailed directly to Athens and put an end to the war; but being always ſlow, and eſpecially ſo in naval affairs, they gave the Athenians time, which of all things they wanted moſt: when they had gained this, they wrought ſo hard at their gallies, that in a ſhort ſpace they equiped a fleet of twenty ſail; the power of the four hundred they aboliſhed by law, conferred the ſovereignty on the five thouſand, and acted in all other reſpects, eſpecially in recalling Alcibiades, with ſuch prudence, moderation, and firmneſs, that Thucydides thinks the commonwealth never enjoyed ſo happy a temperature as at this time. Piſander and the reſt of the vehement ſticklers for oligarchy withdrew unheeded to the enemy. But it is now time to return to the army and fleet at Samos, and to the view of thoſe things which were performed in Ionia. Tiſſaphernes going to Aſpendus, where the Phœnician fleet lay, gave out, that he would comply exactly with all the promiſes he had made to the Peloponneſians. Alcibiades, however, perſuaded the Athenians that he meant nothing leſs, and either with a view to make this probable to them, or that he might indeed bring it to paſs, ſailed with thirteen gallies to Aſpendus, where he held frequent conferences with the Perſian lieutenant, embroiling

ing him thereby so effectually with the Peloponnesians, and they with him, that he destroyed all their affairs. In his absence an engagement happened between the Peloponnesian fleet under the command of Mindarus, which consisted of seventy-three sail, and that of Athens under the command of Thrasybulus, consisting only of fifty-five; at first the Peloponnesians had the advantage, sinking some of the Athenian ships, and running others on shore; but pursuing the advantage too eagerly and breaking their line, the Athenians supplied by their great skill in maritime affairs their defect in force, and entirely defeated the Peloponnesians, taking twenty-one of their ships; it is true, they lost fifteen of their own, but a victory at this time, though dear bought, was a prodigious advantage, it raised the hopes of the Athenians, gave new life to their affairs, and saved all Ionia and the Hellespont: a few days afterwards the Athenians took eight gallies coming from Byzantium which had revolted, presently after they reduced that city, and grievously fined its inhabitants for their disobedience. Alcibiades, returning with his thirteen gallies, took nine more from the fleet, with which squadron he constrained the Halicarnassians to pay a large sum of money, and fortified Cos. The news of these advantages coming to Athens mightily enlivened the people, and inspired them with hopes of recovering Eubœa and putting an honourable end to the war. These events fell out in the summer of the twenty-first year of the war, and here we take leave of our old and sure guide Thucydides, who concludes his history at this point of time. The history of the Peloponnesian war was continued by Theopompus and Xenophon, the work of the former comprehended the events falling out in the next seventeen years, that of the latter the next twenty-eight. Theopompus's writings are swallowed by time, but it may be a great part of their contents are preserved by Diodorus Siculus. The Grecian history of Xenophon remains still in our hands; from these materials therefore, with the assistance of Plutarch's writings, we shall continue our memoirs of the Athenian affairs [1].

Year after the flood, 2588. Before Christ 411.

Doricus, admiral of the Italian gallies, passing to the assistance of the Lacedæmonians in the Hellespont, found the Athenians in his way at Sestos, whereupon he fled to Dardanum, and landing his men endeavoured from the shore to

[1] Thucyd. lib. viii. prop. fin. Diodor. Sicul. lib. xiii. Plut. in vit. Alcibiad. Justin, lib. 5.

to defend his ſhips, which he cauſed to be hal'd on the beach. The Athenian fleet, however, attack'd him, and were upon the very point of making themſelves maſters of all his gallies, when Mindarus the Peloponneſian admiral came to his aſſiſtance with a navy of eighty-four ſail. The Athenians thereupon relinquiſhed their firſt enterpriſe, and prepared for a general engagement, Thraſybulus commanding the right wing, and Thraſyllus the left. Mindarus with his Lacedæmonian ſhips had the right in the Peloponneſian fleet, and Doneus with the Syracuſan gallies were in the left, Pharnabazus with a Perſian army lay hard-by on the ſhore, on whoſe aſſiſtance the Peloponneſians knew they might depend. The Athenians, notwithſtanding theſe diſadvantages, fought with great reſolution, and the battle was yet very dubious, when a fleet of twenty ſail appeared in view, neither party knew to whom they belonged, and therefore both quickned their endeavours to end the fight before their arrival; when they drew near, the admiral's galley hoiſted a purple flag, which was known by all to belong to Alcibiades. The Peloponneſian fleet immediately broke and fled, the Athenians took ten ſhips, and, if a mighty tempeſt had not ariſen, would have taken many more. Mindarus was conſtrained to run his ſhips into any port, and marched with his men to join Pharnabazus, who effectually protected them from the Athenians. The Eubœans having almoſt generally deſerted the Athenians, the Bœotians propoſed to them the joining of their country by an artificial iſthmus to the continent, to which they aſſented, and herein they ſucceeded in ſpight of the oppoſition given them by the Athenians, and the rapidity of the Euripus, i. e. the arm of the ſea they were to fill up. Theramenes the Athenian admiral, finding it impoſſible to hinder this deſign from taking effect, ſailed away to other places, particularly to Paros, reduced them again under the Athenian government, and levied exorbitant fines upon ſuch as, he conceived, had willingly deſerted him; after which he ſailed to join the grand fleet under the command of Thraſybulus. Some ſhort time after this conjunction, advice came that Mindarus by the aſſiſtance of Pharnabazus had taken Cyzicum by ſtorm, upon which it was reſolved to ſail directly thither and fight them. When therefore the Athenian fleet had coaſted to Cherſoneſus, and were arrived at Preconneſus, they anchored there all night, and having landed their men under the command of Chares, directed him to march ſtrait to Cyzicum; as to the fleet they divided vided it into three ſquadrons, the firſt led by Alcibiades, the ſecond by Theramenes, and the third by Thraſybulus; Alcibiades with his ſquadron ſailed in ſight of the Peloponneſian fleet, upon which Mindarus, having with him eighty ſail, put to ſea to give him battle. Alcibiades, when the enemy drew near, broke and fled, whereupon the Peloponneſians purſued him with great joy, when on a ſudden Alcibiades made a ſignal for a new line. The Peloponneſians, looking about them, ſaw the ſquadrons of Theramenes and Thraſybulus, of whom they had no intelligence, between them and the ſhore; upon this, altering their courſe, they endeavoured to get into Cleros, a port near Pharnabazus's camp; Alcibiades purſued them thither, ſinking and taking their ſhips all the way; when they came to the ſhore, however, Pharnabazus ſent them ſuch aid, that the Athenians ſuffered in their turns. Thraſybulus then landed his men to their aſſiſtance, giving Theramenes orders to land alſo to join Chares, and to come with all ſpeed to their aid. Alcibiades dealt with Mindarus and his Lacedæmonians, Thraſybulus fought bravely againſt the reſt of the Peloponneſians and their Perſian ſuccours, notwithſtanding they were much out-numbered and were at laſt ſurrounded. In that inſtant Theramenes and Chares came in with their foot; the battle was long and obſtinately fought, till Mindarus being killed, the Perſians, Peloponneſians, and Lacedæmonians all fled; and thus to his immortal glory Alcibiades gained a victory at ſea and another at land on the ſame day; and took the enemy's whole fleet, and more ſpoil than his and the remains of it could carry away. When the news of this ſucceſs reached Athens, the people were ready to run diſtracted; they immediately levied an army of a thouſand foot and three hundred horſe, and ſent thirty gallies to join Alcibiades, from whom, as he was now maſter of the ſea, they expected all things. The Lacedæmonians conceiving rightly of this war, that it would end in the deſtruction either of the one ſtate or other, ſent Endius their embaſſador to Athens to propoſe a peace. This miniſter delivered himſelf to the aſſembly of the people, after the Laconic manner, in a ſhort, plain, and excellent ſpeech, wherein he ſhewed, that Athens had ſuffered, and was like to ſuffer, more than Sparta from this war, but inaſmuch as the evils occaſioned by war were hateful to all good men, he ſaid the Spartans deſired to free both themſelves and their neighbours, from labouring any longer under them, and that on this account only they had ſent him to treat of peace. The people at firſt were inclined to reliſh what he ſaid, but one Cleophon, an orator, a man of mean birth, and formerly a ſlave, but who had ſurreptitiouſly got his name inſerted in the roll of citizens, by a petulant harangue put all thoughts of peace out of their heads, and engaged them to ſend back Endius without an anſwer. This was the laſt ſtep they had to take for perfecting their ruin, for never afterwards were they in any condition to refuſe peace again, and indeed they did it now merely from the hopes they had, that Alcibiades would for ever conquer, and fortune, who had hitherto been ſo unſteady, fix herſelf now to their ſide [m].

on

In the beginning of the next year, Thraſybulus, having repulſed Agis king of Sparta, who led an army to the gates of Athens, ſailed, with a great fleet, and a ſtrong body of land forces on board, to Epheſus, which he attacked, but was forced to retreat; he went afterwards to Lesbos and other places, where he had better ſucceſs. The Spartans, in the mean time, perceiving that the war was transferred far from Greece, attacked Pylus by ſea and land, whereupon the Athenians ſent a ſquadron under the command of Anytus, but he finding the wind directly againſt him, after he had been ſome days at ſea, returned directly to Athens; upon which the people, according to their uſual cuſtom, condemned him to die, which ſentence, however, he commuted by paying a vaſt ſum of money, being the firſt who reverſed a judgment in that manner. In the mean time, the gariſon of Pylus, after having made an obſtinate defence, rendered upon terms; and thus the Lacedæmonians pulled this thorn out of their ſide, after it had vexed them fifteen years. On the heels of this followed another misfortune, the Megarians ſurpriſed Niſæa, which ſo enraged the Athenians, that they immediately ſent an army into that country, though it could be of no uſe; the Megarians, by the aſſiſtance of the Lacedæmonians and ſome troops from Sicily, ventured a battle, wherein they were moſt ſhamefully beaten, the Athenians killing great numbers of them and committing horrid devaſtations in their country. In the mean time, Alcibiades, Thraſybulus, and Theramenes, did great things in the Helleſpont and Thrace; at laſt they beſieged Byzantium, then well fortified, and having having in it a Lacedæmonian garison under the command of Clearchus; some of its inhabitants, however, betrayed it, and let in Alcibiades and his army; the garison, however, and such of the Byzantines as adhered to them, made so gallant a resistance, that the Athenians were on the point of being driven out; which when Alcibiades saw, he caused proclamation to be made, that the Byzantines should be safe in their persons and effects, where-upon they turned out the garison, which were all put to the sword, except five hundred who were sent prisoners to Athens. This done, Alcibiades received Byzantium into favour [n].

[m] Xenophon. Hellen. lib. 1. Diodor. Sicul. lib. xiii. Plut. in vit. Alcibiad. Juſtin. lib. v. Corn. Nepos. in vit. Alcibiad.

In the beginning of the next year, Alcibiades and Theramenes returned in triumph to Athens, they brought with them a fleet of two hundred ships, and such a load of spoils as had never been seen in Athens since the Persian war. The people left their city destitute, that they might croud to the port to behold Alcibiades as he landed; old and young blessed him as he went by, and the next day when he made an harangue in the assembly, they directed the record of his banishment to be thrown into the sea, ordered the Eumolpides to absolve him from the curses he lay under, created him general with absolute power, and in fine endeavoured to cover him with as many favours as he had conferred benefits on them. The sweetness of his temper, his complacence towards all degrees of people, and the care he took of applying the immense riches he brought to the discharge of taxes, made the best of the Athenians ready to own that he deserved the honours that were paid to him; neither did he long indulge to himself the enjoyment of his glory, but soon put to sea with a fleet of a hundred ships, in order to do further service to his country. He was scarce departed, when Agis king of Sparta made a bold attempt upon Athens; he came with an army of twenty-eight thousand men in the night to the very walls, slew the watch, and gained a part of the walls. The Athenians, greatly amazed, ran to arms, and in the morning sent out a body of horse, equal to the cavalry of the Peloponnesian army; they fought under the walls and in the sight both of the Lacedæmonians and the Athenians; at last the Athenians prevailed, and drove the Peloponnesian cavalry back on their foot, whereupon Agis retired, finding it impossible to prevail against the city. Alcibiades in the mean time, leaving part of his fleet under the command of Antiochus tiochus his pilot, with ſtrict orders to do nothing till his return, ſailed into the Helleſpont, to aſſiſt ſome of the cities which yet ſtood firm to the Athenians. When he was gone, Antiochus, little regarding his orders, went and provoked Lyſander the Lacedæmonian admiral to fight, which he, finding Alcibiades was abſent, very readily did. In this engagement the Athenians were beat, loſing fifteen ſhips with Antiochus their commander. On the news of this defeat Alcibiades returned, and would have provoked Lyſander to a ſecond battle, but that prudent general would not hazard the glory he had acquired. In the mean time, the Athenians, being perſuaded that this diſgrace was owing to the indolence and luxury of Alcibiades, and liſtening alſo to certain ſtories they were told, that he correſponded with Pharnabazus and the Lacedæmonians, inſtantly ſtripped him of his command, naming ten new generals, among whom were Conon, Thraſybulus, and Pericles, the ſon of the famous Pericles. Conon having demanded the fleet from Alcibiades, he readily yielded up his command, but refuſed to return to Athens. He then with his own ſhip paſſed over into Thrace, built a caſtle for his own ſecurity, and erected a little principality in the ſight of his many and potent enemies [o].

[n] Xenophon. Diodor. Plut. Corn. Nepos. Justin. ubi supra.

THE next year, Conon the Athenian general engaged Callicratidas the ſucceſſor of Lyſander in a ſea-fight, wherein he is ſaid to have ſhewn greater conduct, than any admiral before him had done, in the diſpoſition of his fleet; however, he was worſted, loſt thirty of his ſhips, and was cloſely beſieged in Mitylene. News of this coming to Athens, the people were in great confuſion; they admitted all ſorts of perſons to the freedom of their city, who would aſſiſt them in this war, and with much ado equipped a great number of ſhips, which were ſent away to Samos, where their fleet rendezvouſed, with ſtrict orders to relieve Conon at any rate. In obedience to theſe commands, the whole fleet, conſiſting of a hundred and fifty ſail, bore away from Samos: Callicratidas, receiving advice thereof and leaving a force ſufficient to block up the city, ſailed with a hundred and fifty ſhips to Malea, a promontory of Leſbos. The ſame night that he arrived there, the Athenian fleet came to Arginuſæ, a place over againſt Leſbos. In the morning a general engagement enſued, which was fought with with great obſtinacy, till at laſt, the Lacedæmonian admiral being ſunk, the Athenians gained a great victory, with the loſs, however, of nineteen of their own ſhips with moſt of the men in them; but the Peloponneſians loſt ſeventy-nine. It might have been expected, that the people of Athens would have been extremely grateful to thoſe generals, who had gained them this victory, but the very contrary happened, for Theramenes having accuſed his collegues of having taken no care to ſave the dying, or to pay the laſt rites to the dead, they were immediately recalled, two of them, not caring to truſt the people, fled, but ſix of them returned home and ſtood their tryal, alledging, that they were hindered by a tempeſt from doing what they were now accuſed of neglecting; but Theramenes making a moſt laboured and pathetic oration againſt them, in which he now and then ſtopped, that the cries of thoſe who lamented the dead might be heard, and producing in the end a man who pretended to have eſcaped in a meal-tub, and who depoſed that the people when drowning deſired, that the Athenians would revenge them on their generals, the people againſt law and reaſon condemned them all to death. Socrates the philoſopher was at that time one of the prytanes, and reſolutely refuſed to do his office. Diomedon, one of thoſe who were condemned, riſing up, deſired to be heard, whereupon ſilence being made, he ſpoke thus, We all of us wiſh, ye men of Athens, and wiſh it from our hearts, that the ſentence pronounced againſt us may iſſue in the proſperity and happineſs of this city; but ſince we are prevented from paying our vows for the victory, it is but juſt and fit that you return thanks to providence for it. They were then all haled to execution, and ſuffered like brave men, with great reſolution, calmneſs, and fortitude; their names are, Diomedon, Thraſyllus, Calliades, Lyſias, Ariſtocrates, and Pericles, the only ſon of the famous Pericles. A little while after, the madneſs of the people turned the other way, Cleophon the demagogue, who had been very buſy in this matter, was killed in a ſedition, upon which the reſt who had ſtirred in that affair fled, but Calixenus, who pronounced the ſentence, returned afterwards, and being hated by all men was famiſhed to death [p].

[o] Thucyd. Diodor. ubi ſupra. Plut. in vit. Alcibiad. Corn. Nep. in vit. Ejuſd. Juſtin. lib. 5.

The next year, the Athenian fleet aſſembled at Samos under the command of Conon, while Lyſander took the command of what fleet the Peloponneſians had left; he being being unable to fight with ſo ſmall a force, and having too great a one to lie idle, ſailed firſt to Thaſus which he took, afterwards he ſailed to the coaſt of Attica, where being able to do nothing of great moment, he returned to his old ſtation, and ſome time afterwards beſieged and took Lampſacus. The Athenians hearing of this ſailed, under the command of Conon and Philocles, with a fleet of a hundred and eighty ſhips, firſt to Seſtos, and then to the river Ægos where Lyſander lay, daring him to fight, which he, being much inferior in ſtrength, refuſed. While they remained here, the Athenians grew idle and careleſs, and, having a camp on ſhore, ſpent their time in revelling and drunkenneſs. Alcibiades, reſiding in this neighbourhood, could not remain an unconcerned ſpectator; he came therefore to the officers, and earneſtly beſought them to be more vigilant. He told them, that Lyſander was both a wiſe and a fortunate general, and that it became them to take care of him. They anſwered, that they wondered at his aſſurance, who was an exile and vagabond, to come and give laws to them, threatening, if he came any more, to ſeize him and ſend him to Athens; they afterwards concluded among themſelves what they ſhould do with the Peloponneſians, when they were taken priſoners, and reſolved, at the motion of Philocles their general, to cut off their right hands, or, as Plutarch ſays, their right thumbs, that they might never be able to hold a ſpear, but tug at an oar. Adiamantus, one of their officers, could not help ſaying, that ſuch idle diſcourſe was unworthy of Athenians; for which they hated him. Some days after, Lyſander, taking his opportunity, fell upon them, while they lay in diſorder, both by ſea and land, and gained one of the moſt complete victories recorded in hiſtory; Conon with eight gallies only eſcaping to Cyprus. Afterwards returning to Lampſacus, Lyſander put Philocles and three thouſand captives, with all their officers except Adiamantus, to death, by the unanimous judgment of all the confederates. This execution over, he reduced all the cities which had been under the Athenian power, diſmiſſing all their gariſons with great civility; that going home to Athens, the city might be full of people, and empty of bread, whenever he came to beſiege it, which ſoon after he did by ſea; while Agis king of Sparta came with a great land-army before it. For a long time the Athenians defended themſelves, without ſo much as demanding peace. At laſt, being ſore preſſed by famine, they endeavoured to treat with Agis, but he referred them to Sparta: thither then they ſent deputies, who offered to give up all things but their city and port. The Lacedæmonians, however, would liſten to nothing, unleſs their walls were demoliſhed. On the return of the ambaſſadors, Archiſtratus propoſed complying with thoſe terms to the aſſembly, for which he was impriſoned, many preferring death to ſlavery: at length Theramenes undertook to treat with Lyſander, who after a long attendance referred him to Sparta, whither with ſome other deputies he was preſently ſent. On their arrival they found the council of the confederates aſſembled, wherein all gave their votes for the utter deſtruction of Athens, excepting only the Spartans, who declared, they would not conſent to the ruin of that city, which had ſo well deſerved of Greece. On the return of Theramenes peace was concluded upon theſe terms, that the long walls and the fortifications of the port ſhould be demoliſhed. That they ſhould deliver up all their ſhips except twelve, receive all they had baniſhed, and follow the fortune of the Lacedæmonians. Lyſander cauſed the walls to be pulled down, all the muſic in his army playing, on that very day of the year on which they had beat the Perſians at Salamis. He likewiſe eſtabliſhed an oligarchy, expreſly againſt the will of the people; and thus the ruin of Athens ended in the twenty-ſeventh year of the Peloponneſian war.

[p] Xenophon. Diodor. Plut. Corn. Nepos. Juſtin. ubi ſupra.

As ſoon as Lyſander had demoliſhed the long walls and the fortifications of the Piræum, he conſtituted a council of thirty, with power, as was pretended, to make laws, but in truth to ſubjugate the ſtate. Theſe are the perſons ſo famous in hiſtory under the title of the thirty tyrants; they were all the creatures of Lyſander, mere implements of power, who, as they derived their riſe from conqueſt and the law of the ſwords, exerciſed their offices in a ſuitable manner; that is with the higheſt teſtimonies of pride, inſolence, and cruelty. Inſtead of making laws, they governed without them, appointed a ſenate and magiſtrates at their will, and, that they might do all things without danger of controul, they ſent for a gariſon from Lacedæmon, which was accordingly granted them, under the command of Callidius, upon their promiſe to pay the ſoldiers regularly. One of the firſt ſteps they took was to puniſh all informers, who by falſe accuſations had taken off honeſt men and diſturbed the ſtate; this, though ſevere, was popular, but when, through flattery and bribes, they had wholly drawn over Callidius to their party, they ſuffered

ed

ed bad men to live in quiet, and turned their rage againſt the good. Critias and Theramenes were at the head of the thirty, men of the greateſt power and abilities in Athens; the former was ambitious and cruel without meaſure, the latter retained ſome bowels for his country; the former puſhed on all the bloody ſchemes framed by his confederates, and carried into execution many of his own; the latter always oppoſed them, at firſt with moderation, at laſt with vehemence. He ſaid, that power was given them to rule, and not to ſpoil, the commonwealth, and that it became them to act like ſhepherds, not like wolves, and that they ought to beware of rendering themſelves at once odious and ridiculous, by attempting to domineer over all, being ſuch a handful of men as they were. The reſt, diſliking much the former part of his diſcourſe, catched hold of the latter, and immediately choſe out three thouſand whom they made the repreſentatives of the people, and to whom they granted this notable privilege, that none of them ſhould be put to death, but by judgment of the ſenate, thereby openly aſſuming a power of putting any other Athenian citizen to death by their own authority. A glorious uſe they made of this new-aſſumed privilege, for as many as they conjectured to be no friends to the government in general, or to any of themſelves in particular, they put to death, without cauſe, and without mercy. Theramenes openly oppoſing this, and abſolutely refuſing to concur in ſuch meaſures, Critias accuſed him to the ſenate, as a man of unſteady principles, ſometimes for the people, ſometimes againſt them, always for new things and ſtate revolutions. Theramenes owned, that he had ſometimes changed his meaſures, but alledged, that he had always done it to ſerve the people; he ſaid, that it was ſolely with this view that he made the peace with Sparta and accepted the office of one of the thirty; that he had never oppoſed their meaſures while they cut off the wicked, but when they began to deſtroy men of fortune and family, then he owned he had differed with them, which he conceived to be no crime againſt the ſtate. While Theramenes was ſpeaking, Critias withdrew, perceiving that the ſenate were thoroughly convinced of the truth of what Theramenes had ſaid; but he quickly returned with a guard, crying out that he had ſtruck Theramenes's name out of the liſt of the three thouſand, that the ſenate had therefore no longer cognizance of the cauſe, which the thirty had already judged, and condemned him to death. Theramenes, perceiving that they intended to ſeize him, fled to the altar, which was in the midſt of the ſenate-houſe, and laying his hands thereon ſaid; I do not ſeek refuge here, becauſe I expect to eſcape death, or deſire it, but that tearing me from the altar, the impious authors of my murder may intereſt the gods in bringing them to ſpeedy judgment, and thereby reſtore freedom to my country: the guards then haled him from the altar, and carried him to the place of execution, where he drank the poiſon with undaunted courage, putting the people in mind with his laſt breath, that as they ſtruck his name out of the three thouſand, they might ſtrike any of theirs. His death was followed by a train of murders, ſo that in a ſhort time ſixty of the worthieſt and moſt eminent citizens of Athens fell by the cruelty of the thirty. Amongſt theſe the moſt pitied was Niceratus the ſon of Nicias, a man univerſally beloved for his goodneſs, and univerſally admired for his virtues. As for the Spartans, they, loſing their former generoſity, were extremely pleaſed with theſe things, and by a public decree commanded, that ſuch as fled from the thirty tyrants ſhould be carried back bound to Athens; which extraordinary proceeding frightned all Greece; but the Argives and Thebans only had the courage to oppoſe it; the former received the Athenian exiles with humanity and kindneſs, the latter puniſhed with a mulct ſuch of their citizens as did not riſe and reſcue the Athenian priſoners, who, in purſuance of the Lacedæmonian decree, were carried bound through their territories [r].

Xenoph. Hellen. lib. ii. Diodor. lib. xiv. Plut. in vit. Lyſander. Corn. Nepos. in vit. Ijuſd. Juſtin, lib xv.

THRASYBULUS and ſuch as with him had taken ſhelter in the Theban territory reſolved to hazard ſomething, rather than remain perpetual exiles from their country; and though he had but thirty men on whom he could depend, yet conſidering the victories he had heretofore obtained in the cauſe of his country, he made an irruption into Attica, where he ſeized Phyla, a caſtle at a very ſmall diſtance from Athens, where in a very ſhort ſpace his forces were augmented to ſeven hundred men; and though the tyrants made uſe of the Spartan gariſon, in their endeavours deavours to reduce him and his party, yet Thrasybulus prevailed in various skirmishes, and at last constrained them to break up the blockade of Phyla, which they had formed. The thirty and their party conceiving it very advantageous for them to have the possession of Eleusina, marched thither, and having persuaded the people to go unarmed out of their city that they might number them, took this opportunity most inhumanly to murder them. The forces of Thrasybulus encreasing daily, he at length possessed himself of the Piræum, which he fortified in the best manner he could, but the tyrants being determined to drive him from thence, came down against him with the utmost force they could raise. Thrasybulus defended himself with great obstinacy, and in the end they were forced to retreat, having lost before the place not only a great number of their men, but Critias the president of the thirty, another of the same body, and one who had been captain of the Piræum; when they came to demand the dead from Thrasybulus in order for their interment, he caused a cryer he had with him to make a short speech in a very loud voice to the people, intreating them to consider, that as they were citizens of Athens without, so those against whom they fought, and who fought to preserve themselves within, the fort, were Athenian citizens also, wherefore, instead of thinking how to ruin and destroy their brethren, they ought rather to consult how all differences ought to be composed, and especially ought to rid themselves of those bloody tyrants, who, in the short time they had had the administration in their hands, had destroyed more than had fallen in the Peloponnesian war. The people, tho' moved by these discourses, differed among themselves, the consequence of which was, that they expelled the thirty, and chose ten men out of each tribe to govern in their stead, whereupon the tyrants retired to Eleusina. The citizens, however, though they changed the government, made no agreement with those in the Piræum, but sent away deputies to Sparta, as did also the tyrants from Eleusina, complaining, that the Athenians had revolted, and desiring their assistance to reduce them. The Spartans sent thereupon a large sum of money to encourage their confederates, and appointed Lysander commander in chief, and his brother to be admiral, resolving to send sea and land-forces to reduce Athens, a second time, intending, as most of the Greek states suspected, to add it now to their own dominions.

[r] Xenophon. Hellen. lib. ii. Diodor. lib. xiv. Plut. in vit. Lyſand. Alcibiad. Corn. Nepos. in vit. Lyſand. Juſtin. lib. v.

It is very probable[12], that this deſign of theirs would have taken effect, if Pauſanias king of Sparta, envying Lyſander, had not reſolved to obſtruct it. With this view he procured another army to be raiſed againſt the Athenians, of which himſelf had the command, and with which he marched immediately to beſiege the Piræum. While he lay before the place and pretended to attack it, he entered into a private correſpondence with Thraſybulus, informing him what propoſitions he ſhould make in order to force the Lacedæmonians, who were ſuſpected by all their allies, to grant them peace [f].

THE intrigues of Pauſanias had all the ſucceſs he could wiſh; the Ephori, who were with him in the camp, concurred in his meaſures, ſo that in a ſhort ſpace a treaty was concluded on the following terms; that all the citizens of Athens ſhould be reſtored to their houſes and privileges, excepting the thirty, the ten which had ſucceeded them, and who had acted no leſs tyrannically than they, and the eleven, who during the time of the oligarchy had been conſtituted governors or keepers of the Piræum; that all ſhould remain quiet for the future in the city, and that if any were afraid to truſt to this agreement, they ſhould have free leave to return to Eleuſina. Pauſanias then marched away with the Spartan army, and Thraſybulus at the head of his forces marched into Athens, where, having laid down their arms, they ſacrificed with the reſt of the citizens in the temple of Minerva, after which the popular government was reſtored. Yet quiet was not thoroughly eſtabliſhed, the exiles at Eleuſina having endeavoured by the help of money to raiſe an army of foreigners, by whoſe aid they might recover the authority they had loſt; but firſt depending on their friends in the city, they ſent ſome of the principal perſons amongſt them, as deputies to treat with the citizens, but ſtrictly inſtructed them to ſow jealouſies and excite diſcords among them. Which the latter quickly perceiving, put theſe perſons to death, and then remonſtrating to thoſe at Eleuſina, that theſe contentions would undoubtedly end either in their own, or the deſtruction of their country, they offered immediately to paſs an act of oblivion, which they would confirm with an oath. This being accepted, thoſe who had withdrawn returned to the city, where all differences were adjuſted, and both parties moſt religiouſly gioufly obſerved the agreement they had made, and thereby thoroughly reſettled the ſtate. In this whole tranſaction, the virtue of Thraſybulus deſerves chiefly to be admired. When he firſt ſeized the caſtle of Phyla, the tyrants privately offered to receive him into their number inſtead of Theramenes, and to pardon at his requeſt any twelve perſons he ſhould name; but he generouſly anſwered, that his exile was far more honourable than any authority could be, purchaſed on ſuch terms; and by perſiſting in his deſign, he accompliſhed, as we have ſeen, the deliverance of his country. A glorious deliverance it was, ſince, as Iſocrates informs us, they put fourteen hundred citizens to death, contrary to, and without any form of, law, and drove five thouſand more into baniſhment, procuring alſo the death of Alcibiades, as many think, though at a great diſtance from them (N). Much

[f] Xenophon. Diodor. Plutarch. Corn. Nepos. Juſtin. ubi. ſupr.

(N) We are here to ſpeak of the misfortunes of Alcibiades, a man who deſerved much of his country, and would have deſerved more, if her impatience had not prevented his ſervices, and her ingratitude deprived him of the power of ſerving her. Plutarch tells us, that he was removed from his employment, not becauſe he had done any fault, but becauſe he had not performed all which the Athenians hoped from him; his ſucceſs in his firſt expedition had ſo elated them, that they would not afterwards believe he could fail of atchieving any thing which he deſired to atchieve, tho' his ſhips were ill provided, and tho' he had no pay for his ſoldiers; when therefore he was ſent to Chios and Ionia, they concluded the firſt news they heard would be, that they had reduced both; being diſappointed in this their fond opinion, they grew angry, and perſecuted him a new for not doing what in the nature of things it was not poſſible he ſhould have done. With the public madneſs of the people conſpired the private envy of the chief men amongſt them. Thraſybulus began to diſlike him, and moſt of the ten commanders, who afterwards periſhed by popular rage, now buſied themſelves in turning it on him, of which when Alcibiades had notice, he retired, according to his old maxim, that it was fooliſh to ſtudy a defence againſt an accuſation when it was poſſible to fly from it. In his expedition into Thrace he made uſe of ſuch as offered their ſervice, and he did it with honourable intent; firſt to ſettle a ſecure retreat for himſelf, and ſecondly, to preſerve the Greek cities in his neighbourhood from the inſults of theſe Thracians, who as they yielded no obedience to the king, ſo they conſulted nothing but their own intereſt, preying, as occaſion ſerved, on any who were leaſt able about this time, that is, a little after the popular government was ſettled again in Athens, Socrates was condemned able to reſiſt. After the entire deſtruction of the Athenian fleet, and the flight of Conon to Cyprus, Alcibiades thought himſelf no longer ſafe in his caſtle; for the Lacedæmonians, his inveterate enemies, being now every where powerful, he was afraid they ſhould take this opportunity of avenging the many defeats they had received from him; he therefore retired firſt into Bithynia, but finding himſelf not ſafe there, he went to Pharnabazus, who received him with great civility, and, as he believed, with great friendſhip. In Athens, the people, ſighing under the thirty tyrants, placed all their hopes in Alcibiades; they knew his love for his country, and they doubted not but he would make ſome effort to relieve her. The tyrants themſelves expected the ſame thing, and eſpecially Critias their chief, who had been his moſt intimate friend, and at whoſe motion the decree had been made for recalling Alcibiades from baniſhment; but the luſt of power deſtroys all ties, whether of blood or affection. He, who was before his friend, became now his bitter enemy, and ſending to Lyſander aſſured him, that Athens would never be quiet, or Sparta ſafe, till Alcibiades was deſtroyed. The Lacedæmonian general, ſcorning to defile himſelf with an aſſaſſination, treated theſe notices with the contempt they deſerved; but Critias, applying to the magiſtracy of Sparta procured an order to be ſent from thence to Lyſander, which he durſt not diſobey. Upon receipt of this order, Lyſander ſent away a meſſenger to Pharnabazus, deſiring him to put it in execution. Pharnabazus committed the affair to Magæas his brother and to his uncle Suſamithres. Alcibiades reſided at that time in a ſmall village in Phrygia, together with Timandra a miſtreſs of his. As he ſlept he had this dream: he thought himſelf attired in his miſtreſs's habit, and that ſhe, holding him in her arms, dreſſed his head and painted his face as if he had been a woman. Others ſay, he dreamed, that Magæas cut off his head, and burnt his body; and it is ſaid, that it was but a little while before his death that he had theſe viſions. They who were ſent to aſſaſſinate him had not courage enough to enter the houſe; but ſurrounding it firſt they ſet it on fire. Alcibiades, as ſoon as he perceived it, getting together great quantities of cloaths and furniture, threw them upon the fire, with a deſign to choak it; and having wrapped his robe about his left arm, and holding his naked ſword in his right, he caſt himſelf into the middle of the fire, and eſcaped ſecurely through it, before it had time to take thoroughly the furniture and other materials he had thrown into it. The Barbarians, as ſoon as they ſaw him, retreated, and none of them durſt demned and put to death. He was not only a philoſopher, or one who in words profeſſed the love of wiſdom, but one who in deeds, as well as by his excellent ſayings, demonſtrated that he was truly wiſe. As a ſoldier, he had been preſent in ſeveral engagements; in one he preſerved the life of Alcibiades, in another he carried off a friend of his, who was wounded, upon his back, in a third ſhewed as much courage and conduct as the moſt experienced generals. In all the campaigns wherein he ſerved, he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by enduring hardſhips with patience, executing punctually whatever he was commanded, and complying readily with any thing that was deſired of him; for tho' he was exceedingly temperate and ſtrictly ſober, yet if his company was deſired he refuſed not to go to entertainments, and to drink there as other people did. He refuſed to meddle at all with matters of ſtate, till he grew far in years, and was then elected into the ſenate by his tribe. He oppoſed, as we have already related, the judgment given againſt the generals for not burying the dead, though Theramenes his friend had promoted it; and when he was called upon to put that judgment into writing, as his office required, he durſt ſtay to expect him, or to engage with him; but ſtanding at a diſtance they ſlew him with their darts and arrows. When he was dead, the Barbarians departed, and Timandra took up his dead body, and covering and wrapping it up in her own robes, the very beſt ſhe had, ſhe buried it as decently and as honourably as her preſent circumſtances would allow. She buried him in a town called Meliſſa: and we learn from Athenæus, that the monument remained to his time, for he himſelf ſaw it. The emperor Adrian, in memory of ſo great a man, cauſed his ſtatue of Parian marble to ſet up thereon, and ordered a bull ſhould be ſacrificed to him annually. Ephorus the hiſtorian, as he is cited by Diodorus Siculus, gives quite another account of his death, than that before recited from Plutarch. He ſays, that Alcibiades, having diſcovered the deſign of Cyrus the younger to take up arms, informed Pharnabazus thereof, and deſired that he might carry this news to the king; but Pharnabazus, envying him that honour, ſent a confident of his own, and took all the merit to himſelf, which Alcibiades ſuſpecting, went to Paphlagonia and ſought to procure from the governor thereof letters of credence to the king, which Pharnabazus underſtanding, hired people to murder him. He was deſtroyed in the fortieth year of his age (1).

(1) Plutarch in vit. Alcibiad. Diodor. Sicul. lib. xiv. Corn. Nep, in vit. Alcib. Athen. in Deipnoſ.

he ſaid he was unacquainted with the law terms, and at laſt abſolutely refuſed it. Afterwards he ſought to reſcue Theramenes, when he was accuſed by his collegues; after his death, he continued to ſpeak his mind freely, which gave ſome umbrage to the thirty, who notwithſtanding ſuffered him to live, becauſe Critias was his intimate friend. But the danger he was in hindered him not from diſcloſing his mind to his aſſociates, particularly he ſaid one day to Antiſthenes on account of the eminent men who were daily taken up: "Doth it repent thee, that we have done no"thing memorable, or at all comparable to what thoſe
"monarchs have performed, who are celebrated in trage"dies, ſuch as Atreus, Thyeſtes, Agamemnon, and Egi-"ſthus? They are in thoſe plays beheaded, feaſted with "their childrens fleſh, and ſome way or other deſtroyed at
"laſt; but no poet had ever the hardineſs to introduce the "death of a hog upon the ſtage." One of his friends complaining, that of late he was grown a no-body, and could pretend to no poſt or office, Socrates demanded tartly, Are you ſorry for it? At another time he delivered himſelf in a public converſation thus: "A herdſman would be very "diſingenuous, who, in caſe the cattle grew worſe and
"the herd thinner by his management, would not confeſs
"himſelf an ill herdſman; but the governor of a city would "be yet more diſingenuous, if, ſeeing his citizens grew
"worſe and thinner, he ſhould not own himſelf an ill go"vernor." Which being reported to the tyrants, Critias and Charicles ſent for him, and forbad him to converſe with any man under thirty, on pain of having his head placed ſomewhere elſe than upon his ſhoulders; but not being yet ſatisfied of his fidelity to their government, they ſummoned him to the ſenate-houſe, and ordered him to go with ſome other perſons, whom they named, to ſeize one Leon, a man of rank and fortune, whom they determined to put out of the way, that they might enjoy his eſtate; this commiſſion Socrates flatly refuſed, and, not ſatisfied therewith, added alſo his reaſon for ſuch refuſal. I will never willingly, ſaid he, aſſiſt an unjuſt act. Charicles replied ſharply, doſt thou think, Socrates, to talk always in this high ſtyle, and not to ſuffer? Far from it, added he, I expect to ſuffer a thouſand ills, but none ſo great as to do unjuſtly. Upon which he went directly home, where he would not have been long ſafe, if the tyrants had not ſhortly after been obliged to turn their thoughts to the contriving of means for their own ſafety, rather than to project how to injure and deſtroy deſtroy others. The cauſe of this great man's death was the pique one Anytus had taken againſt him, who drew in Melitus, a bold young man, and Ariſtophanes the comic poet. The laſt of theſe broke the ice firſt, brought Socrates upon the ſtage in a comedy of his called the clouds, wherein he repreſents him as a man given to a ſubtle fallacious manner of arguing, whereby he could make a bad cauſe ſeem good, an introducer of new gods, whilſt himſelf worſhipped none, and a petulant railer at thoſe things which others held ſacred. Socrates himſelf went to the theatre, where he ſat in the moſt conſpicuous place; and when one of his friends aſked him if it did not vex him to be thus treated, he anſwered, Not at all; I fancy I am at a feaſt where every one enjoys me. A long time after this Anytus, conceiving the ſeaſon now proper for the execution of that vengeance which he had ſo long meditated, engaged Melitus to prefer a complaint againſt him to the ſenate, which he did in theſe words: Melitus ſon of Melitus, a Pythian, accuſeth Socrates ſon of Sophronicus, an Alopetian. Socrates violates the law, not believing the deities whom this city believeth, but introducing other new gods. He violates the law likewiſe in corrupting youth, the puniſhment death. When the day of trial came on, Melitus opened the proſecution with a very poor harangue, in which he was often prompted, and had much ado to get through it. The crimes he therein alledged were, that Socrates perſuaded his ſcholars to contemn the laws of the republic; that he was the intimate friend of Critias and Alcibiades, that he taught young people to be diſreſpectful to their parents, by telling them, that he would make them more knowing than their fathers, with many other things of a like nature. When he had done, Anytus began a long and malicious harangue, wherein he was favourably heard; and after him Lyco in a ſet rhetorical ſpeech ſupported the accuſation. When theſe had done ſpeaking, Socrates went up into the orators deſk, and from thence ſpoke after this manner to the people; "I am ſurprized, O Athenians! "how Melitus came by this extraordinary piece of know-"ledge, that I do not worſhip the gods the city worſhips. "Others have ſeen me, and ſo might Melitus, if he had "pleaſed, ſacrifice at common feſtivals on the public altars; "how do I introduce new deities, when I profeſs in all my "actions to be directed by the voice of god? they who ob-"ſerve the notes of birds or the anſwers of men are guided "by the voice. None doubts of thunder, that it proceeds

"from

" from the ſupreme power and is oraculous. That the " prieſteſs on the tripod conveys to us by her voice what
" ſhe receives from the god, who doubts? and that he
" foreknows future events, and communicates them to " whom he pleaſes, all men believe and confeſs as well as " I. Many call ſuch as foretel future things, ſoothſayers " and diviners. I aſcribe theſe things to the dæmon, and,
" I conceive, ſpeak more religiouſly therein, than they who
" fancy I know not what divine power in birds; that I am
" no impoſtor herein, many can atteſt, who have aſked
" my advice, and never found it fail; let ſuch as are in-
" credulous hear this alſo to confirm their opinions; as to " my being favoured of the gods, when Chærephon, in the " preſence of many witneſſes, inquired of the oracle at
" Delphos concerning me, Apollo anſwered, that no " man was more free, more juſt, more wiſe; yet the ſame
" god ſaid more of Lycurgus the Lacedæmonian law-giver,
" that he knew not whether to call him a god or a man.
" Me he compared not with the gods, though he gave " me the priority amongſt other men, but truſt not the " gods herein, conſider me exactly your ſelves, whom have " you leſs a ſlave to ſenſual pleaſures? Whom more free?
" I accept neither ſtipends nor gifts. Whom more juſt " than him who conforms himſelf ſo to the preſent time, as
" that he ſtands not in need of the defence of any other?
" who will ſay that he deſerves not the title of wiſe, who,
" ſince he was able, never loſt any opportunity of learning,
" by enquiry, all the good poſſible? And that I took not the " pains in vain, is evident from hence, that citizens and
" ſtrangers, ſtudious of virtue, have preferred my conver" ſation to that of other men. Why do you think ſo many " deſire to oblige me by gifts, whom they know to have
" no capacity of requiting them? or how can you account
" for my engaging ſo many, without requiring any re" turn from them? that when the city was beſieged,
" and every one lamented the wretchedneſs of his con" dition, I ſhewed no alteration of temper, but remain" ed the ſame as before; that while others lay out their " money on exterior things to pleaſe themſelves, I furniſh
" myſelf from within, with ſuch things as pleaſe me better.
" If none can controvert what I ſay, how comes it to paſs
" that I deſerve not commendation both of gods and men,
" inſtead of being charged, as I am now by you, Melitus,
" that with theſe inſtructions I corrupt youth? Every one " knows what it is to corrupt youth; can you name one

" whom

" whom I of religious have made impious, whom from a " modeſt deportment I have rendered impudent, of a frugal " diſpoſition prodigal, of a ſober habit debauched, of a har- " dy way of life effeminate ? know ye any of theſe ? " " I know thoſe, anſwered Melitus, whom you have per- " ſuaded to be more obedient to you than to their own pa- " rents. " " With reſpect to inſtruction, I confeſs, I " have, anſwered Socrates, for that was my ſphere, not " theirs. In regard to their health, men conſult phyſicians " before their parents ; in law-ſuits they apply to council, " not to couſins ; and in war you inquire as to your gene- " ral's ſkill in arms, not who are his allies. ". " With " good reaſon, cryed Melitus, and fit we ſhould. " " Is " it ſo, ſaid Socrates : If others are preferred for ſuch " things as they excel in, and with reaſon too, can you " think it fit, becauſe in the opinion of ſome I have an " advantage beyond others in the educating of youth, " which is a matter of the greateſt conſequence to ſo- " ciety, that therefore I ought to ſuffer death ? Anytus " and Melitus, O my judges, may procure that judg- " ment, but hurt me they cannot : to fear death is to " ſeem wiſe and not to be ſo, for it is to pretend " to underſtand what we really underſtand not, no " man knows what death is, or whether it be not the " greateſt happineſs which can arrive to us, yet all fear and " ſhun it, as if they were ſure it would be the greateſt miſ- " fortune. " Plato would alſo have ſpoke in his defence, and going up into the deſk, opened his ſpeech thus : Though I, Athenians, am the youngeſt of thoſe that come up into this place. The people immediately cried out, of thoſe which go down, which they conſtrained him to do with- out ſpeaking another word ; then proceeding to vote, it was carried againſt Socrates by two hundred eighty-one voices. He might, however, have eſcaped with a fine, which his friends offered to pay for him, but he contented himſelf with ſaying, that to pay a fine was to acknowledge an offence, and that what had provoked a proſecution againſt him deſerved rather the higheſt rewards, and a main- tenance out of the public ſtock, than a pecuniary mulct. At this the judges were ſo much incenſed, that they judged him to a capital puniſhment by a majority of eighty. He might eaſily have avoided this, if his friends could have pre- vailed upon him to have made his eſcape ; but he refuſed, drank the poiſon in their preſence, praying to God to make his paſſage from this life happy, and ſhewed the ſame calm-

neſs

neſs and reſolution in death, for which throughout his life he had been famous (O).

It

(O) Socrates happened to be condemned the very day after the ſacred ſhip ſet ſail for Delos. The reader muſt obſerve, that this ſhip went annually in commemoration of the mighty deliverance of Theſeus in Crete, and in conſequence of his vow. It was a rule of their religion never to be broken through, that from the time of the departure of this ſhip from the port of Athens to the time of its coming back, no malefactors were ever put to death; this ſometimes, by means of contrary winds, occaſioned the intervention of a conſiderable ſpace, as happened in the caſe of Socrates, who was in priſon thirty days before his death; in this time he was viſited by his friends, ſome of whom offered to carry him away by force, at which he laughed. Why, ſaid he, do you know any place out of Attica where death never comes? Plato hath wrote a long diſcourſe concerning the manner of his death; we will from thence tranſcribe only ſo much as relates immediately thereto, though indeed the whole is an admirable piece, and extremely well worth the reading. "It was now ſun-ſet, for "he had ſtayed long within, when the officer entered, and after a "little pauſe, ſaid, I have not, Socrates, obſerved that carriage "in you which I have found in others; but as I thought you "the moſt generous, the mildeſt, and beſt of all men, that ever "came into this place, ſo I now ſee you hate me not, for that "whereof others are the cauſe: you know the meſſage I bring, "farewel; bear what you cannot remedy. With that he de-"parted weeping; and fare thee well, ſaid Socrates, I am well: "how civil is this man? I found him the ſame all the time of "my impriſonment, he would often viſit and diſcourſe with me, "uſed me always courteouſly, and now ſee how kindly he weeps "for me; but come, Crito, let us do as he bids us, if the poi-"ſon be ready let it be brought. The ſun is yet ſcarce ſet, an-"ſwered Crito, others take it late after a plentiful ſupper and "full cups; make not ſo much haſte, there is time enough. He "replied, they who do ſo think they gain time, but what "ſhall I gain by drinking it late, only deceive my ſelf, as cove-"tous of life, and ſparing of that which is no longer mine? Pray "let it be as I ſay; then Crito ſent one of the attendants, who "immediately returned, and with him the man that was to ad-"miniſter the poiſon, bringing a cup in his hand. To whom "Socrates; Prithee honeſt friend, for thou art well verſed "in theſe buſineſſes, what muſt I do? nothing, ſaid he, but as "ſoon as you have drank, walk till you find your legs begin to "fail, then lie down, and in ſo ſaying he gave him the cup. So-"crates took it chearfully, not changing either countenance or "colour;

It is eaſy to judge, from the uſage they gave the worthieſt men amongſt them, the Athenians leaſt deſerved to meet with patriots; yet ſo it was, that notwithſtanding her ill uſage, never any city was more beloved by her citizens. Conon,

" colour; and, looking pleaſantly upon him, demanded, whe" ther he might ſpill any of it as a libation, who anſwered, he " had made no more than would juſt ſerve. Yet, ſaid Socrates,
" I may pray to God, and will, that my paſſage hence may be " happy, which I beſeech him to grant, and in that ſame inſtant " drank it off eaſily, without any diſturbance. Many of us, who " till now had refrained from tears when we ſaw him put the " cup to his mouth and drink off the poiſon, were not able to " contain any longer; which Socrates obſerving, Friends, ſaid
" he, what mean ye? for this reaſon I ſent away the women,
" leſt they ſhould be ſo unquiet: I have heard we ſhould die with
" gratulation and applauſe, be quiet then and take it patiently.
" Theſe words made us with ſhame ſuppreſs our tears; when he " had walked a while, perceiving his legs to fail, he lay down on " his back as the executioner directed him; who looking on his " feet, pinched them hard, aſking him if he felt it; he anſwered
" no; he did the like to his legs, and ſhewing us how every part
" ſucceſſively grew cold and ſtiff, told us when that chilline's
" came to his heart, he would die; not long after he ſpake theſe
" his laſt words, O Crito, I owe Æſculapius a cock, pay it, no" glect it not. It ſhall be done, ſaid Crito, will you have any " thing elſe? He made no anſwer, lay ſtill a while, then ſtretched
" himſelf forth; with that the executioner uncovered him, his " eyes were ſet, Crito cloſed them. This was the end of the " beſt, the wiſeſt, and moſt juſt of men". Tho' Leo Allatius and ſome others have endeavoured to repreſent the time of the death of Socrates as a point not eaſily ſettled, yet they are certainly in the wrong, ſince there is ſcarce a great event in the whole Greek hiſtory, the time of which is more unqueſtionably ſettled. The Arundelian marbles, and many other authorities, ſhew that it happened when Laches was archon, in the firſt year of the ninety-fifth olympiad, that is 2599 years after the flood, and four hundred before the birth of Chriſt. The reader may poſſibly be deſirous to know what became of his enemies; and becauſe we ſhall have no opportunity of inſerting it in the hiſtory, we will add it in this note. The Athenians grew very quickly ſenſible of the miſchief they had done, and becauſe it was irreparable they ſo hated its authors that they would not ſuffer them to light fire at their houſes. They would not anſwer them a queſtion. They would not bathe with them; and if they were ſeen to touch ever ſo large a veſſel of water, they threw it away as impure, until theſe

Conon, who, after the misfortune which befel him at the battle of the Helleſpont, which was followed by the deſtruction of Athens, had kept himſelf cloſe in Cyprus and never ventured home, now conceived in his mind a mighty project, no leſs than the reſtoring of the Athenian affairs to their ancient ſtate, and beſtowing once more upon that city the empire of the ſea; with this view he cauſed a project to be tranſmitted to the Perſian king, wherein he endeavoured to demonſtrate, that the pride of the Lacedæmonians would be extremely detrimental to his affairs, that, their dominion once thoroughly ſettled in Greece, they would preſume to give laws to Aſia alſo, eſpecially with reſpect to the Greek cities therein, and that therefore it would be expedient for the Perſians to conſider of ſome means for putting it once more in the power of Athens to check the inſolence of that aſpiring ſtate, and thereby preſerve the great king's dominions in peace and ſafety. Conon's memorial was quickly ſupported by facts; two Lacedæmonian armies, within the compaſs of a few years, paſſed over into Aſia, the laſt under Lyſander and Ageſilaus, which performed great things, and would have performed greater, if the Perſian king had not, by ſending ſome of his agents with vaſt ſums of money into Greece, raiſed ſo many and ſo powerful enemies againſt Sparta, that ſhe was conſtrained to recal Ageſilaus to her aſſiſtance. The expediency of Conon's advice being ſo fully made known, he, as a perſon perfectly well ſkilled in maritime affairs, was preferred to be admiral of the Perſian fleet; the Athenians in the mean time had the courage to join with the Argives and other ſtates in a war againſt the Lacedæmonians, which they purſued with variety of fortune. Conon attacked the Lacedæmonian fleet, which was nearly equal to that of the Perſians, which conſiſted of ninety ſail, and after an obſtinate engagement, wherein the Spartan admiral was killed, totally defeated it, taking fifty ſhips and five hundred priſoners. Afterwards he and Pharnabazus obliged moſt of the ſtates, dependent on Lacedæmon, to change ſides, particularly thoſe of Coos, Niſæa, Teos, and Chios; Mitylene, Epheſus, Erythrea, and other places followed their theſe men, unable to bear this uſage longer, hanged themſelves; and for the ſame reaſon the Athenians, that they might blot from their minds the memory of ſo black an action, forbad the name of Socrates to be mentioned in the theatre (2).

(2) Pluto in Phæd. Plut. de Invidia & odio.

their example, and thus the Lacedæmonians at once loſt the empire of the ſea. Conon determined after this unexpected ſucceſs to return to Attica, and in his way thither brought over the Cyclades, reduced Cythera, put a gariſon therein, and, after having confirmed the Corinthians in their league with the Athenians, ſailed from thence to Athens, where he promiſed the citizens to rebuild the long wall and to refortify the city, which he accordingly performed as far as in him lay, hiring a multitude of workmen, and landing a great number of men from the fleet; the Thebans alſo ſent five hundred carpenters and maſons, and other cities did the like; but Tiribazus, who commanded the Perſian armies in Aſia, envying Conon's great ſucceſs, gave out, that he made uſe of the Perſian power merely to get towns and countries of his own citizens. To anſwer which charge, he ſent for him to Sardis, where upon his firſt appearance he threw him into priſon [f].

The diſturbances in Greece gave the Athenians an opportuntity of re-eſtabliſhing their affairs, and making themſelves once more conſiderable; the Corinthian war particularly, as it laſted a conſiderable time and with various ſucceſs, ſerved as a kind of ſchool to the Athenian youth who addicted themſelves to arms; and it ſerved the better, becauſe the Athenian general, who then commanded, was Iphicrates, not only the beſt officer of Greece in his days, but who, in his knowledge of the art of war, exceeded all who went before him; others had ſtudied it from the glory reſulting therefrom, Iphicrates looked upon it as a ſcience, for which he laid down rules, and brought things nearer a certainty than it was ever conceived they would have been. Plutarch tells us, that he was the ſon of a ſhoe-maker, but Cornelius Nepos does not mention any thing of his family; the firſt exploit by which he diſtinguiſhed himſelf was in a ſea-fight, where finding himſelf wounded and unable to remain on board the enemy's ſhip, he catched up one of the ſoldiers in his arms and carried him on board his own, which ſhews, that he had great ſtrength of body, as well as mighty preſence of mind. We are told further with reſpect to his perſon, that it was wonderfully venerable, and that he ſtruck with with awe all ſuch as converſed with him. He ſhewed his good ſenſe in altering the habit and arms of the Athenian ſoldiers which had been uſed to his time; inſtead of large heavy ſhields, he gave them light ones; inſtead of ſhort ſpears, long ones, and inſtead of little ſtabbing ſwords, weapons of a more uſeful ſize. In this war of Corinth he gained by his ſkill great advantages over armies, more numerous and compoſed of better ſoldiers than his own. He carefully fortified his camp though it was in the country of his allies; and when ſome of his officers, who thought he gave the ſoldiers needleſs trouble, aſked him, who he was afraid of; I am afraid, anſwered he, of being forced to uſe that expreſſion, which of all others leaſt becomes a general, I did not think of it. Ageſilaus king of Sparta, whoſe troops had been elſewhere always victorious, were notwithſtanding beaten with great loſs by this Athenian, which exceedingly grieved Ageſilaus, and made him abate ſomewhat of that haughtineſs he had hitherto ſhewn upon all the offers which had been made to him for peace. Abroad the affairs of the Athenians went but ill, the exiles from Rhodes, which was now under a democratic government, went to Sparta, and boaſting there of their great intereſt, and of the facility with which their country might be brought to change ſides and join with the Lacedæmonians, two fleets were ſent to that iſland. The Athenians, greatly alarmed at this, diſpatched the famous Thraſybulus, to whom they owed their deliverance, to prevent the deſigns of the Lacedæmonians from taking effect. When this great captain came into theſe ſeas, he received ſuch intelligence from Rhodes, as thoroughly convinced him, that any attempt he made thereupon would be fruitleſs; he therefore ſailed to the Helleſpont, where he reconciled two Thracian princes, and made them confederates with the Athenian ſtate; after this he bent his endeavours to the reducing ſuch cities as, taking advantage of the bad ſtate of the Athenian affairs, had revolted from them. In purſuance of this ſcheme, he reduced Byzantium and Chalcis, and afterwards ſailing over to Leſbos, where all the cities had revolted except Mitylene, he brought them again under the obedience of Athens, and levied conſiderable ſums of money by way of fine for the revolt; after theſe victories he ſet ſail for Rhodes, hoping that the fame of them would awe the people of that iſland, and contribute to the end for which he had been ſent thither. Firſt of all all he exacted a ſum of money from Aſpendus, but after it was paid him, his ſoldiers having plundered ſome of the inhabitants without his knowledge, it ſo much provoked them, that in the night, when Thraſybulus thought himſelf ſafe and expected no harm, they ſuddenly entered his camp, where they committed great ſlaughter, and in the beginning thereof ſlew him, which ſo terrified his ſoldiers, that, making what haſte they could to their ſhips, they withdrew, without attempting to proſecute further the expedition on which their general had been ſent. This end had Thraſybulus, a man who in point of virtue was inferior to none, in fortune ſuperior to moſt, and in the glory of freeing his country from ſervitude, without any view to his own intereſt, ſcarce equalled by any. The Athenians to ſupply his place were conſtrained to ſend Iphicrates, for they had not now, as formerly, choice of generals; their inſolence and their misfortunes having either driven away or extinguiſhed all their great men. Iphicrates had only with him eight gallies and twelve hundred men, when he joined the remains of Thraſybulus's fleet, hitherto commanded by one Argyrius; he having intelligence, that Anaxibius, the Lacedæmonian admiral, proud of ſome ſmall ſucceſſes he had obtained, lay very careleſly at Abydus, immediately ſailed thither, and intercepting him one day abroad with twelve more governors of towns, fell upon and ſlew them, after which Iphicrates ſailed to Cherſoneſus. Shortly after this Ægina, at the motion of Eteonicus revolted, whereupon the Athenians ſent one of their admirals with a fleet to reduce it, which could not be effected; on the contrary, the inhabitants of the iſland, as ſoon as the Athenian fleet was withdrawn, began to infeſt the coaſt of Attica, which vexed the Athenians exceedingly, and conſtrained them to keep a ſquadron continually at ſea, to protect as well the villages on the ſhore, as their ſhips employed in trade, an evil they had not experienced ſince the cloſe of the Peloponneſian war. The affairs of the Lacedæmonians obliging them to remove the fleet they had in the neighbourhood of Ægina, the Athenians ſent Eunomes with a ſtrong ſquadron to keep in Gorgopas, who was left to command there. Gorgopas, finding his much outnumbered by the Athenian gallies, retired into port and landed his troops, which when the Athenian admiral perceived, he put to ſea in the night, carrying a light in his poop, that the reſt of his ſhips might ſteer after him.

[f] Xenophon. lib. iv. Diodor. lib. xiv. Corn. Nepos, in vit. Cononis.

Gorgopas instantly reimbarked his men and stood away after the Athenian fleet, keeping aloof, till Eunomes, entering a port of Attica, began to land his men; which when he had half finished, Gorgopas fell upon them with great vigour, and after an obstinate fight carried off four gallies to Ægina; this loss was a little after repaired by Chabrias the Athenian general, for he sailing to Cyprus, with a fleet which had a body of land-forces on board, landed in Ægina in the night-time, and having posted the major part of his troops in a valley near the temple of Hercules, ordered the rest to advance towards a place called the Three Towers at break of day; Gorgopas, as soon as he had intelligence of the Athenians landing in the island, marched with what forces he could to oppose them, and sent orders to all who were on board the fleet to hasten to him with the utmost speed; which accordingly they did; and these rushing all by the ambuscade where Chabrias lay, he suddenly charged them in flank and rear, while the other Athenians fell upon them in front; Gorgopas with eight Spartans being quickly slain, the rest betook themselves to flight, of whom Chabrias cut off near four hundred men, which, with the want of the subsidies they expected from Sparta, so broke the spirits of the inhabitants of Ægina, that they undertook nothing for a considerable time after. At length Teleutias being sent from Sparta to command the gallies in that island, he so wrought upon the people by his fair speeches, that they went on board the ships, and offered to follow him where he pleased. He, having sacrificed and taken a day's provision on board, put out to sea, and having in the night rode very near the port of Athens, as soon as it was day, he sailed strait into the Pyræum, where he took several gallies and a great number of prisoners. These he sent presently away to Ægina, and afterwards cruizing along the coast, carried off several trading vessels and an immense booty, out of which having given his men a month's pay beforehand, he so raised their spirits, that they were ready to undertake any thing. In the height of their ardor he fell upon an Athenian squadron of eight gallies and took them; after which drawing together a fleet of eighty sail with twenty gallies of Syracuse, he roamed about without rival, and maintained the dominion of the sea for the Lacedæmonians [t].

The

[t] Xenophon. lib. iv. v. Diodor. Sicul. lib. xiv. Corn. Nepos, in vit. Iphic. Thrasyb. & Chabr.

THE Spartans, willing to ſecure the great advantages they had obtained, ordered Antalcidas their admiral to ſettle with the miniſters of the king of Perſia the terms of a general peace in Greece; for, on account of the Corinthian war and the vaſt expence of keeping ſo many fleets at ſea, Sparta was grown weary of fighting, though ſhe had the better of her rival. The Athenians on the other hand, wearied out with continual misfortunes, were far from being averſe to the putting an end to the war; for which the reſt of the cities of Greece were anxious, provided the peace was not prejudicial to their intereſts; they therefore ſent all of them agents to Tiribazus to know what terms the king his maſter would propoſe. The Perſians having firſt ſhewn them the great king's ſeal, opened his diſpatch; the contents of which were, that the king thought it juſt the cities in Aſia ſhould belong to him and remain under his juriſdiction, and that all the reſt, little and great, ſhould remain free; of the iſlands, however, he claimed Clazomene and Cyprus; Lemnos, Imbros, and Sciros, he left to the Athenians, becauſe they had belonged to them time out of mind, declaring moreover, that if any of the Greek ſtates rejected theſe terms, he and the reſt of the confederates would compel them to accept them by continuing the war by ſea and land. The Lacedæmonians and Athenians accepted them, and became once more friends and allies; this from its author was ſtiled the peace of Antalcidas, which in the main was very ſcandalous to Sparta, who, after ſo long pretending to vindicate the liberties of the Grecian cities in Aſia, now delivered them up to the king [u].

Peace of Antalcidas. Year after the Flood, 2612. Before Chriſt, 387.

THE deſign of this peace was evidently the raiſing Sparta to an uncontroulable dominion over the Grecian ſtates, which ſhe began to exerciſe immediately after it took effect, falling firſt on the Mantineans, and afterwards on other little ſtates, at laſt on Thebes itſelf, where, without the leaſt provocation, the Lacedæmonians ſeized the citadel, and enabled the Thebans of their faction to tyrannize over their country, of whom four hundred fled to Athens, which city was far from making the ſame figure now as formerly; the Grecians remembering with averſion her cruelty when in power, and ſeeing with diſdain her indolence under the affronts of Sparta. The Theban exiles, however,

[u] Xenophon. Diodor. ubi ſupra. Plut. in vit. Ageſil. & Artax. Corn. Nepos, in vit. Iphicr.

however, found here not only a ſafe place of refuge, but all the kindneſs and aſſiſtance they could reaſonably expect from the principal men of Athens, who laboured hard to perſuade the people, that it was both ſafe and honourable for them to ſuccour theſe unhappy men. The exiles, unſatisfied with being ſafe abroad, longed to live with freedom at home; they therefore found means to ſet on foot a conſpiracy in Thebes, and by the private aſſiſtance of the Athenians brought matters ſo to bear, that they got poſſeſſion of the city; but fearing leſt the Lacedæmonians ſhould ſend mighty ſuccours to their gariſon in the citadel, they ſent deputies to Athens, beſeeching the people to call to mind with what kindneſs they had received the Athenians, who were baniſhed by the thirty tyrants, and how far it was owing to their aid that the Athenians recovered that liberty which they now enjoyed, conjuring them not to deſert them now, when the Thebans were ready to fight againſt Sparta for the liberty of Greece, but to afford them ſuch ſuccours as might enable them to fight with hope. The people, having heard the Theban deputies, came preſently to a reſolution of ſending away ſuch a body of auxiliaries, as might at once demonſtrate their gratitude to the Thebans and their care of the liberty of Greece; with this view they ſent Demophoon at the head of five thouſand foot and five hundred horſe, who marched with prodigious diligence to Thebes, where they enabled thoſe of their party to take the citadel, which they effected before the Lacedæmonians could relieve it; after which the Athenians returned home. From this time forward they ſought by all means to raiſe a party againſt the Spartans, by putting themſelves at the head, by which they hoped to recover their ancient luſtre. The forces, however, of the Lacedæmonians, being as yet much greater than their own, made them ſometimes obliged to diſſemble their hatred to that ſtate, and alſo to diſcountenance thoſe orators who were notoriouſly enemies to Sparta. An accident happened at laſt which entirely changed the face of things, and conſtrained the Athenians to declare openly againſt Lacedæmon. One Sphodrias a Spartan, who commanded at Theſpis, undertook a bold expedition, in which if he had ſucceeded, his countrymen muſt have been abſolute lords of Greece; for he marched ſuddenly with a great body of troops towards Athens, and hoped to ſeize the fort of Pyræum in the night; but when he had marched as far as Eleuſina, the ſun began to appear, upon which his ſoldiers refuſed refuſed to march any farther. That he miſſed his blow was far from being the worſt conſequence of his raſhneſs; the Athenians were ſo much alarmed, that they ſeized certain Spartan embaſſadors who were in their city, and made them priſoners, conceiving, that they were privy to this attempt; but they, aſſerting their innocence, aſſured the people of Athens, that Sphodrias ſhould be called to a ſevere account, and pay with his life for this infamous attempt, whereupon they were releaſed; but Sphodrias being brought to a trial and acquitted, the Athenians inſtantly declared war, accounting it better to hazard all things in the field, than to be in danger of having their throats cut in their houſes by ſuch ſudden expeditions. They named on this occaſion three generals, Timotheus, Chabrias, and Calliſtratus, directing them to levy an army of twenty thouſand foot and five hundred horſe; they likewiſe ordered a fleet to be fitted out of two hundred ſail. To ſhew that they did not intend to fight for themſelves only, but that they would do juſtly by all their confederates, they reſtored all the lands, which had been divided among their citizens, out of Attica to their ancient proprietors, and offered ſuch reaſonable terms to their allies, particularly the fixing a ſenate, which was to conſiſt of one deputy from each city of Athens, that they preſently drew over a great number to their ſide, and exceedingly alarmed the Lacedæmonians. The fame alſo of the Athenian generals was of no ſmall ſervice to their country, for Timotheus was exceedingly eſteemed on account of his father Conon's merit, and for his own magnanimity and prudence; Chabrias was reputed one of the firſt generals of his age, and Calliſtratus was a man of great worth and high accompliſhments; as for Iphicrates, the king of Perſia had begged him of the Athenians, and they held the friendſhip of that prince, in conſideration of the great ſervices he received from that experienced general. In the mean time, the Lacedæmonians invaded Bœotia under the command of their king Ageſilaus, who with a mighty army braved the Thebans and their allies in the neighbourhood of their own city. Chabrias, who commanded them, took poſt along the deſcent of a hill; and when Ageſilaus led the Spartan army in battalia towards them, Chabrias ordered his ſoldiers to lean one knee on the ground, to let their ſhields hang careleſsly on their arms, but to keep their ſpears extended as if they intended to continue in their poſts, and to expect the Spartans without putting themſelves into any hurry.

Ageſilaus having weighed within himſelf the advantage they had in ground, the intrepidity of the men, and the experience of their general, retired without attempting to force them. Afterwards the Athenians obtained ſome advantages, and in conſequence of them obliged Cleombrotus king of Sparta to retire without entering Bœotia. Chabrias in the interim was recalled to take upon him the command of the Athenian fleet which was to go againſt Naxus; he beſieged the capital of that iſland, but in vain, Pollis the Lacedæmonian coming with a great fleet to its relief. Chabrias, deſirous to regain the honour of his country, reimbarked his forces, and offered the Lacedæmonians battle; the engagement was long and obſtinate, at laſt, however, he gained an abſolute victory, though with the loſs of eighteen gallies, the Lacedæmonians loſing twenty-four, beſides eight that was taken with all their men. But Chabrias did not purſue this victory as he might have done, being deterred by the fate of the ſix generals, who had ſuffered for not ſuccouring the wounded and burying the dead; as it was, he recovered the Athenian reputation at ſea, for this was the firſt naval victory, which, with their own proper forces, the Athenians had acquired ſince the Peloponneſian war. Afterwards he ſailed againſt the Thracians, and delivered the Abderites whom they had treated with great cruelty; but while he was here taking care of the affairs of the city and providing againſt the return of the barbarians, he was, as ſome ſay, aſſaſſinated, none knew by whom, or for what reaſon. The Athenians ſent Timotheus to ſupply his place, which he effectually did, proving more formidable to the Lacedæmonians in his ſingle perſon, than all their enemies beſide; for by his eloquence, affability, and juſtice, he drew many of their allies to forſake them, and by his great ſkill in maritime affairs he vanquiſhed them in a ſea fight at Leucades, ſo that all things went proſperouſly for the Athenians on this ſide. Artaxerxes king of Perſia endeavoured all this time to reconcile the Grecians among themſelves, becauſe he wanted mercenaries to be employed in a war he intended againſt Egypt. The Athenians and Lacedæmonians themſelves were weary of war, and therefore ſuffered themſelves to be the more eaſily intreated; beſides, they were both apprehenſive, that the Thebans would at length run away with that authority for which they had ſo long contended; they therefore clapped up a ſudden peace, which was ill kept, upon theſe terms, terms, that all cities ſhould be free; to which the Thebans would by no means yield, for they would never conſent, that all the little cities of Bœotia ſhould be freed from their dominion. Iphicrates, much about this time quitted the Perſian ſervice, where he had been entruſted with the command of twenty thouſand Greeks, eſcaping with a ſingle ſhip to Athens. The reaſon of this was, that Pharnabazus and he had differed, whereupon the Athenian, fearing that this Perſian general would ſerve him as he had Conon, that is clap him into a priſon and put it out of his power to defend himſelf, choſe rather to quit his command than hazard his liberty, and therefore retired in the manner before-mentioned; he was quickly followed to Athens by Perſian embaſſadors, who charged him with mighty crimes, and earneſtly deſired that he ſhould be puniſhed; to which the Athenians anſwered, that they would puniſh him when he was proved guilty; but in the mean time, having occaſion for his ſervice, they made him admiral of their fleet. The late peace having given the Grecian cities a juſt title to freedom, diſputes aroſe in many of them, whether ariſtocracy or democracy ſhould prevail, and theſe diſputes not being accommodated by words, ſedition and civil war enſued in ſeveral places, eſpecially in Zacynthus and Corcyra; the Lacedæmonians, notwithſtanding the peace, aſſiſted to the utmoſt of their power ſuch as were for oligarchy, and the Athenians, according to their old practice, befriended every where the democratic government. Mneſippus the Lacedæmonian general blocked up Corcyra, the inhabitants of which were on the very point of being ruined; Timotheus, who had been ſent to their aſſiſtance, having found it neceſſary to ſail to Thrace, preferring the ſervice of his own country to the neceſſities of its allies, for which the Athenians rewaded him and Iphicrates after the old manner, that is to ſay, they condemned them both; but when the former brought along with him many embaſſadors, who deſired to renew the ancient leagues between their conſtituents and Athens, and alſo proved that he had encreaſed the fleet with thirty gallies and brought mighty ſums into the public treaſury; the Athenians, in regard to his own and his father's merit, who by rebuilding their walls had made Athens once more a city, reſcinded their former decree, and reſtored Timotheus to his command. In the mean time, Cteſides was ſent with five hundred men to Corcyra, where he was ſo fortunate as to kill the Lacedæmonian general, and to leave very little to be done by Timotheus and Iphicrates, who came at length with the fleet. Artaxerxes ſtill labouring to reconcile the Grecian ſtates, and the Athenians having conceived a violent antipathy againſt the Thebans for deſtroying Platæa and Theſpis, ſent deputies to Sparta with Calliſtratus at their head, and there concluded a peace on the old terms, that all the cities ſhould be ſet at liberty, to which, as before, the Thebans refuſed to conſent; this happened in the beginning of the hundred and ſecond olympiad, Alciſthenes being archon at Athens [x].

The Athenians declare for and aſſiſt the Lacedæmonians.

THE Athenians, now perceiving that they were become very inconſiderable, endeavoured to ſtrengthen themſelves, by propoſing an oath to the cities of Greece, that they would obſerve the truce eſtabliſhed by the king, and in caſe any injury was offered to one city, that ſhe ſhould be aſſiſted by all; this was readily yielded to by all, except the Eleans and Thebans: between the latter and the Spartans a new war broke out, in which the latter were ſo diſtreſſed, that they demand aid of the Athenians, who thereupon ſent Iphicrates, who in this expedition loſt ſome part of his reputation. Some Negotiations for a general peace being ſet a-foot at the court of the Perſian king, the Athenians amongſt the reſt ſent deputies, and amongſt them one Timagoras; the Thebans, who now aimed at the dominion of Greece, ſent Pelopidas, a man of ſuperior abilities, who drew to himſelf the confidence of the Perſian king, and having found a way to bring over Timagoras to his party, he clapped up a peace, whereby it was agreed, that Meſſene ſhould be exempted from the Lacedæmonian government; that the Athenians ſhould no more pretend to the ſovereignty of the ſea; that the cities ſhould be governed by their own laws, and the Thebans be eſteemed the king's chief friends and allies. Timagoras on his return was accuſed to the Athenian people of having betrayed his truſt, upon which he was condemned and put to death. The Argives falling upon the Phliaſians on account of their remarkable fidelity to the Lacedæmonians and bringing them to great ſtreights, the latter deſired aid of the Athenians, who thereupon ſent Chares to their aſſiſtance, who behaved himſelf with great prudence and valour, and gained two victories againſt the Argives. After this the Athenians entered into a ſtrict league with the Arcadians, for they were forced to temporize, [x] Xenoph. Hellen. lib. vi. Diodor. lib. xv. Plut. in vit. Ageſil. Corn. Nepos, in vit. Timoth. Juſtin.

porize, and to take ſuch opportunities, as the times offered for maintaining themſelves in any ſhew of power. Timotheus their laſt great commander gave, however, ſome degree of credit to their arms, by reducing Torone and Potidea in Macedonia under their obedience, and raiſing the ſiege of Cyzicum. The war ſtill continuing between the Thebans and Lacedæmonians, Epaminondas, deſiring to put an end to it at once, fought the famous battle at Mantinea, againſt the Lacedæmonians, Arcadians, Achæans, Eleans, and Athenians; of the latter there were ſix thouſand, who behaved very well in the left wing where they were poſted, but were at laſt put to flight by the Thebans; however, they rallied again and remained in the field of battle till the engagement was over, wherein, indeed, the Thebans had the victory, but it coſt them very dear; for they loſt here Epaminondas their glorious general, who firſt inſpired them with the thoughts of attaining the ſovereignty of Greece both by land and ſea. Some ſtirs in Arcadia engaged the Athenians to ſend thither a great army under the command of Pammenes, who performed what he was ſent for, and returned home with honour. Alexander, prince or tyrant of Pherea, having undertaken an expedition againſt the Cyclades, met with ſome oppoſition therein from Leoſthenes the Athenian, whereupon he attacked ſome gallies belonging to that ſtate and took them; upon which the Athenians being angry with Leoſthenes's bad ſucceſs, condemned him, and ſent Chares with a fleet into thoſe parts, who was ſo far from repairing the diſaſters which had already fallen out, that by his ill management he greatly increaſed them, plundering the confederates of the Athenians, delaying any attempts upon the enemy, creating ſeditions where-ever he came, and ſeeming to have nothing elſe in view but to enrich himſelf [y].

The firſt Macedonian war. Year after the Flood, 2639. Year before Chriſt, 360.

We are now come to thoſe times in which the Athenians came to contend with Philip of Macedon, unluckily for them, when all their great captains were exhauſted, and when this prince appeared with a genius ſuperior to all the politicians and chieftains of his time. The Athenians were very early apprehenſive of his abilities, and therefore they eſpouſed the cauſe of Argius his competitor, to whoſe aſſiſtance they ſent Mantias, at the head of three thouſand men, with a great fleet. This Mantias put things into into a good poſture at his firſt arrival ; for beſides the Macedonians, who adhered to Argius, the Pæonians and the Thracians were of his Party. King Philip advanced, however, with an inferior army, as if he came to an aſſured victory, rather than to a doubtful engagement. Firſt, he took off the Pæonians and Thracians, by giving them a prodigious ſum of money, and as ſoon as they were retired, he fell upon Argius and Mantias, who ſtill lay with their army at Methone, and thoroughly routed them. The Macedonians of Argius's party he purſued, but ſuffered the Athenians to make an orderly retreat, which mightily affected the ſpirits of that people, and readily diſpoſed them to an accommodation, wherein they chiefly ſought to make themſelves maſters of Amphipolis, to which Philip quitted his claim, the ſituation of his affairs requiring it, and in conſequence thereof a peace was concluded ; however, he took it ſhortly afterwards, pulled down its walls, and expelled ſuch of its citizens as had given him offence ; the Athenians not being able to relieve it, on account of the many troubleſome affairs in which they were now engaged, and of which we are next to give an account [z].

[y] Xenoph. Hellen. lib. vii, viii. Diodor. lib. xv. Plut. & Corn. Nep. ubi ſupra. Juſtin. lib. vi.

The ſocial war. Year after the Flood, 2643. Year before Chriſt, 356.

The Chians, Rhodians, Coans, and Byzantines, growing weary of the Athenian yoke, reſolved to throw it off and ſet themſelves free. The Athenians on the firſt notice thereof ſent Chares with a land army to beſiege Chios, while Chabrias (who, as we obſerved, Diodorus affirms to have been ſlain long before) was to block up the place by ſea. Cornelius Nepos, who expreſly wrote the life of that general, ſays, that he was no more than a private man in this expedition, but that the ſoldiers and ſeamen, having a better opinion of his ſkill than of their general's, in a manner forced on him the command, which reſpect of theirs proved his deſtruction ; for endeavouring firſt to enter the haven where he had broke in, no-body followed him, ſo that being encompaſſed by the enemy, his galley was ſunk, out of which caſting himſelf he might eaſily have eſcaped, as others did, but preferring a glorious death to a life without honour, he continued fighting till he was ſlain. If we may credit the author beforementioned, the Athenians, doubting whether Chares with his fleet of ſixty ſail would be able to reduce the confederates again under their dominion, diſpatched away ſixty other ſhips under the command of Timotheus and Iphicrates, making them all equal equal in commiſſion. In the mean time, the confederates fitted out a fleet of a hundred gallies, and with it infeſted Imbros and Leſbos, taking all ſhips that fell into their hands, and raiſing contributions where-ever they landed their troops, ſo that by theſe methods they acquired mighty ſums of money, where-with they paid their armies and fleets; they afterwards beſieged Samos both by land and ſea. The Athenian generals, to conſtrain them to abandon this deſign, went and beſieged Byzantium, which had the effect they propoſed, for immediately the confederates raiſed the ſiege of Samos, and with their utmoſt force bore away for Byzantium. When they came before the port, they offered the Athenians battle; but a great ſtorm ariſeing, Timotheus and Iphicrates thought it improper to fight, though Chares vehemently preſſed it; and becauſe he could not carry his point, he ſent home to Athens and accuſed his collegues, at which the people were ſo incenſed, that they caſhiered and fined them; Timotheus, being unable to pay his mulct, did not return to his country, but retiring to Chelos broke his heart. Such was the end of the great Conon's ſon, a man no way inferior to his father, either in military ſkill or in love to his country; the Athenians, when they heard of his demiſe, remitted the greateſt part of his fine to his ſon, but they obliged him to pay a tenth of it, which they moſt unaccountably appropriated to the reparations of thoſe walls, which had been built by his grandfather. Philip of Macedon in the mean while took Pydna, which he afterwards delivered up to the Olynthians, after which he beſieged and took Potidea, which had ſo long been under the power of the Athenians, and which was of vaſt advantage to them in all their Thracian war. Chares the Athenian admiral, having now no-body to check him, raſhly engaged in an arduous affair, whereby he hoped greatly to ſerve his country. Pharnabazus having revolted from the king of Perſia, a mighty army was ſent againſt him by the king; Chares, hoping that the Perſian would well repay the favour, joined him with his forces, and together they proved an over-match for the king's generals, whom they totally routed. The Athenians, as their cuſtom was, ſtruck with the firſt news of the victory, cried up Chares as one of the greateſt patriots that could be; but afterwards, when the Perſian king by his ambaſſadors complained of the act, as contrary to the amity which ſubſiſted between them, and when it was reported abroad that the Perſians intended to lend the confederates a great fleet, the Athenians treated Chares as a traitor, and cried out vehemently againſt that action which they had as vehemently commended, and, in the firſt tranſports of fear, reſolved to make a peace with the ſtates which had revolted from them, almoſt upon their own terms; accordingly peace was concluded, tho' little to the honour of the Athenians, after the war had laſted four years [z].

[z] Diodorus lib. xvi. Plut. Corn. Nep. Juſt. ubi ſupra.

Phocian war Year after the flood, 2644. Before Chriſt 355.

THE Phocian war broke out the ſame year, in which the Athenians made peace with the ſtates which had revolted from them; this war concerned all Greece, and particularly the Athenians, and therefore, though they had nothing to do with the beginning of it, yet it is requiſite we ſhould give an account thereof here. The Phocians had plowed ſome of the lands dedicated to the Delphian Apollo, for which they were fined by the Amphictyones or ſtates general of Greece, but inſtead of ſubmitting to the judgment of that court, the Phocians, at the motion of Philomelus a bold and daring ſpeaker, carried their inſult on Apollo yet farther, and ſeized on the temple and all its riches; this put all Greece into a flame, the Locrians and Bœotians made war on the Phocians, and to countenance their cauſe ſtyled it ſacred; the Phocians, on the other hand, pretended, that they were far from being ſacrilegious perſons, for that they meddled not at all with the riches of the temple, but only reſumed the honour of protecting it, which had belonged to their anceſtors; but knowing that an army could better ſupport their pretenſions than fine ſpeeches, they applied themſelves to the Lacedæmonians and Athenians, and prevailed on them to become their allies. The war laſted a long time and with various ſucceſs, ſometimes the Phocians, and at other times the Thebans, prevailing; however, it was conceived, that the Athenians acted unworthily in ſending ſuch great ſupplies as they did to the Phocian commanders; at one time no leſs than five thouſand foot and three hundred horſe, becauſe it was certain, that the chief reaſon which induced them thereto was the high pay given to their troops, and as the money expended on this occaſion was raiſed, either by the coinage, or ſale, of the dedicated things in the temple of Delphos, it was conſidered as a ſacrilege to recive any part of this theft, eſpecially for defending the robbers. But indeed the Athenians were much degenerated in their manners, of which their inclinations to theſe ſort of proceedings may paſs for a manifeſt

[z] Diodor. Plut. Corn. Nep. Juſt. ubi ſupra.

feſt proof; for though it is certainly beneath a wiſe and free people to run, as the Athenians had formerly done, into groſs and cruel ſuperſtitions, yet it has been in all times accounted a certain ſign of corruption and degeneracy; when people loſe all ſenſe of religion, and openly affront thoſe powers they pretend to worſhip. It is true, the Athenians pretended to colour the aſſiſtance afforded by them to the Phocians, by pretending they were their old allies, and that they endeavoured to raiſe up their power to ballance that of the king of Macedon; but even at this diſtance of time we may conclude, that theſe were merely pretences, ſince it is certain, that when Iphicrates intercepted ſome ſtatues of gold and ivory, ſent by Dionyſius the Sicilian, they ſent him orders to ſell them publickly, notwithſtanding they were dedicated to the Olympian Jupiter and to the Delphian Apollo. But it muſt be owned, that not Athens only, but all Greece, was at this time governed by money; the Perſian king, who had always made uſe of gold to preſerve himſelf from the unwelcome viſits of the Greeks, and to purchaſe their aſſiſtance when he found it neceſſary, employed it now more than ever, and laid out greater ſums in Greece than any of his predeceſſors, becauſe bribery, like other vices, riſes higher by degrees; and when men have been accuſtomed to take money, they require larger wages than thoſe which contented them at firſt. Philip of Macedon, having found a way to render the gold mines in Thrace infinitely more beneficial to him, than they had been to the Athenians, openly practiſed the ſame art, maintaining penſioners in all the ſtates of Greece, and in Athens among the reſt. The Phocian chiefs had nothing elſe to ſupport their cauſe but money, and that they parted with it very freely, we may gueſs from what Diodorus and Plutarch tell us; that in a few years they ſquandered ten thouſand talents, which falls little ſhort of two millions of our money. The orators, or, as the Athenians ſtiled them, the Demagogues, that is, ſuch as led the people by their ſpeeches, were the moſt of them retained by ſome or other of theſe parties. Demoſthenes himſelf, who was by far the moſt worthy of that number, was not unimpeached of accepting Perſian gold. He became about this time eminent, and therefore, according to our cuſtom of giving the characters of Athenian ſtateſmen, it is neceſſary, that we ſhould here draw his, ſince he was the Pericles of his time, and in right of his eloquence held a kind of dominion over his fellow-citizens. He was the ſon of an eminent

nent Athenian, who had raiſed a great fortune from the manufacture of ſword-blades, but was far from being a black-ſmith, as Juvenal would have us believe. Demoſthenes himſelf ſeemed leaſt of all deſigned by nature for an orator, his perſon was far from being handſome, his tongue was too large, his voice weak and broken, and his geſture very uncouth. His father dying when he was young and his own conſtitution being weak, his mother indulged him to the prejudice of his education, and his guardians, taking advantage of his tender years, impoſed on him to the prejudice of his fortune; theſe unforeſeen accidents led him to commence orator, for being engaged by that time he was ſeventeen years old in ſeveral law-ſuits, he pleaded his own cauſe, which no law forbad, and having from thence attained an ability of ſpeaking, he attempted, when of a proper age, to harangue the people, in which he ſucceeded ſo ill, that it had like to have diſcouraged him from ſpeaking more; but his paſſion for becoming an orator enabled him to get the better of nature and the people; to render his tongue flexible, he accuſtomed himſelf to ſpeak with ſtones in his mouth; to raiſe his voice to a proper pitch, he declaimed on the ſea ſhore; to repreſs a habit he had got of ſhrugging his ſhoulders, he hung a ſword drawn in his chamber, at ſuch a height, that when he practiſed his orations it pricked his ſhoulders whenever he pulled them up: long practice ſupplied him with all things, and knowing he had nothing to truſt to but his merit, he by ſtudy and patience acquired a manly ſolid eloquence, not only ſuperior to that of his contemporaries, but alſo excelling all that went before, and all who have come after him, which his orations, yet in our hands, demonſtrate beyond a queſtion. He declared himſelf, in loud terms, againſt the prevailing follies of his countrymen, he reproached them with their fickleneſs, faithleſſneſs, and want of true regard for the public intereſt. He exclaimed againſt their vanity, in attributing to themſelves the merit of their anceſtors, and fancying that the reputation of the antient Athenians would ſupport the vices of their poſterity. He expatiated on the neceſſity of purſuing the old method of making war, by maintaining an army of free citizens, not of mercenaries, and taking care of their naval affairs; he adviſed them to be kind to their allies, and ready on all occaſions to aſſiſt them, whereby they might keep war at a diſtance, enure their ſubjects to martial toils, and revive the glory of the

Athenian

Athenian name. He exhorted them to live always upon good terms with the Perſian, becauſe it was no longer in his power, or indeed in his will, to think of conquering them; but, on the contrary, it was his intereſt to preſerve them from being conquered, as it was theirs to preſerve the independency of all the ſtates of Greece. Above all, he cautioned them againſt the growing power of the Macedonian, he obſerved, that the dominion of republics ſeldom laſted long, whereas monarchies laſted the longer for being powerful; whence he inferred, that they ought to fear Philip more than the Thebans, and not ſuffer themſelves to be amuſed, either by his ſpecious pretences of loving peace, or of his affection to the Athenian ſtate; but in theſe diſcourſes, as he ſhewed himſelf a true patriot, ſo there wanted not many pretended ones, who ſtrenuouſly pleaded the cauſe of Philip. But the Macedonian in the mean time did not altogether depend either on his money, or the friends purchaſed by his money, but endeavoured by force to eſtabliſh himſelf in that abſolute power over Greece which he affected. He made uſe of the war then raging between the Phocians and the Bœotians to march into Greece, and though he had ill ſucceſs in two engagements, yet he overcame at laſt, and, partly by force, partly by fraud, gained poſſeſſion of the ſtreights of Thermopylæ; then it was that Demoſthenes endeavoured to rouſe the Athenians to a proper ſenſe of their danger, and to that end compoſed the firſt of thoſe orations which bear the title of Philippic, and which to this day are held inimitable in their kind; he ſhewed the Athenians, with great perſpicuity and candor, that it was to no purpoſe to make uſe of palliations in their dangerous condition, or to fancy that to apply a remedy to this evil and that would preſerve them from ruin. He proved to them, that Philip's plain and ſettled deſign was to advance himſelf to the ſovereignty of Greece, in conſequence of which they muſt become his ſubjects, tho' he might perhaps call them his allies. He therefore adviſed them to think of forming a plaiſter as broad as the ſore, and, inſtead of oppoſing Philip here and there, in ſending ſuccours as they had two or three times already done to places taken before they could arrive, to begin a war in earneſt, to excite all their confederates to riſe in arms, and concur with them in deſtroying the power of an ambitious prince, who would neither be contented with his own, nor ſuffer other people to enjoy their poſſeſſions in quiet. He concluded with aſſuring them, if they truſted any longer to expedients they would be ruined, becauſe Philip would every day grow ſtronger, and they weaker; whereas, by following vigorous and uniform counſels, they might poſſibly retrieve all things, and reduce Philip and his Macedonians to their primitive obſcurity. The Athenians liſtened, as they were wont to do, attentively to his diſcourſe, and came to ſome reſolutions which were ſuitable thereto; but contented themſelves with this, and took no care to put their votes in execution. To ſay the truth, they were at this time very unfit for great undertakings; the general they chiefly relied on was Chares, a man of great vices and ſmall abilities; it is true, Phocion was then in their ſervice, but they employed him in a trifling war in Cyprus, where it was not in his power to do them much good; beſides, he was ſo modeſt that he never ſought command, nor inſtigated wars that he might raiſe his authority by them, though, taken as a ſoldier and an orator, as a ſtateſman and a general, he was by far the greateſt Athenian of his time. As he was a moſt diſintereſted patriot, he could have no great affection for Philip, but, as he perfectly well knew the diſpoſition of his countrymen, and how unlikely they were to ſupport long ſuch meaſures as were neceſſary to pull down the Macedonian power, he did not expreſs himſelf vehemently, but choſe rather to cultivate the eſteem which on all occaſions Philip ſhewed for the ſtate of Athens as a means of preſerving her, when things ſhould be in that ſtate which he conceived they wanted virtue to prevent. From this character the reader will eaſily diſcern, that Demoſthenes and he could not well agree, the former was always warm, his language copious, and his deſigns vaſt and ſurpriſing; Phocion on the other hand was of a mild temper, delivered himſelf in very few words, and propoſed things at once fit and eaſy to be done; yet he ſeldom or never concured with the people, but ſpoke as poignantly againſt their vices as Demoſthenes himſelf; inſomuch, that this orator once told him, The Athenians, Phocion, in ſome of their mad fits will murder thee. The ſame, anſwered he, may fall to thee, Demoſthenes, if ever they come to be ſober. At this ſeaſon ſuch of the Athenians as had a competent ſhare of eloquence and knowledge in ſtate affairs, applied themſelves to the management of the aſſemblies, to the practice of pleading, and other civil matters; ſuch again, as had ſpent their time in the army, addicted themſelves wholly to military employments, endeavoured to obtain ſuch commands

as

as were at once honourable and lucrative, and meddled little with the civil polity, ſeldom aſpiring to the ſupreme magiſtracy, but confining themſelves wholly to what they conceived their ſphere. Phocion was too wiſe not to diſcern how dangerous ſuch a conduct muſt in the end prove to the ſtate; he ſaw, that their ſpeakers would dwindle into declaimers, and their officers become ſoldiers of fortune, valuing nothing but their rank and their pay. He applied himſelf therefore alike to both, he ſpoke frequently in the aſſemblies, but in few, plain, and ſignificant words; he refuſed no commands that were aſſigned him, never canvaſſed for any, and lived and died poor. The Chalcidian cities fell moſt of them into the hands of Philip in the laſt year of the hundred and ſeventh olympiad, and the year following he made war on the Olynthians, a people who had hitherto been a match for him, and had frequently been an over-match for his predeceſſors. When the news of this expedition was ſpread through Greece, Demoſthenes exerted his utmoſt eloquence to engage the Athenians to aid the people of Olynthus to the utmoſt of their power, and there are ſtill remaining three excellent orations on this ſubject. The reaſons offered by him appeared ſo clear, and the neceſſity of ſending ſuccours to Olynthus was made ſo evident, that relief was decreed. The ſupplies ſent were ſmall, but they came ſo opportunely, that the Olynthians received great advantages from them, which being reported at Athens, the people became inſolent with their good fortune, and affected to give out, that the Athenians had nothing more to do than to appear in a war, in order to carry victory to the ſide they favoured; but Demoſthenes ſhewed them the vanity of theſe light conceits in his third oration on the Olynthian war, wherein he told them, that there was indeed ſome merit in beginning well, but that they were in danger of loſing even this, if they did not proceed with the ſame ſpirit, and enable their confederates not only to repulſe the invaſion of Philip, but alſo to invade him in their turns, and to carry that terror into Macedon, which of late years Philip had ſtruck through all his neighbours. But the Athenians were not able to reliſh ſuch high-ſeaſoned diſcourſes, they were content to ſend a ſquadron now and then to the coaſts of Thrace with a ſmall body of land-troops on board; but to think ſeriouſly of a war like that which their fore-fathers had ſuſtained againſt the Peloponneſians, and for it to forego all their public diverſions, and relinquiſh all the donatives which they at preſent received ceived from the revenue of the ſtate, was what the Athenians of thoſe times could not be brought to endure; what therefore Demoſthenes had predicted came exactly to paſs, Olynthus could not long reſiſt the power of Philip's armies and his bribes; on the contrary, two of its cizizens betrayed the place into his hands, where having exerciſed all that his cruelty and his avarice could dictate, he marched away, big with new projects for aggrandizing his own empire and ruining his neighbours [z].

The Phocian, or, as the friends of Philip affected to call it, the ſacred war, was open yet, and the Bœotians and their allies, who were unable to carry it on with their proper forces, entreated the king of Macedon to come down into the heart of Greece, and put an end thereto. But Philip, being at that time intent on his conqueſts in Thrace, did not liſten ſo readily to this propoſal as was expected; the true reaſon was, that he grew apprehenſive of the Athenians, and was in ſome doubt, whether, conſidering their great intereſt in Thrace, they might not be able to ſtir up much miſchief in his abſence. He therefore propoſed to make peace with them, and, his party in Athens having drawn over many to an opinion that this would be a mighty advantage to their republic, Æſchines with ſome other deputies were ſent to treat with him. He made theſe embaſſadors wait his leiſure, until he had finiſhed his affairs in Thrace; then he came ſuddenly down into Theſſaly, propoſing to paſs immediately into Phocis, which grievouſly alarmed the Athenians, notwithſtanding their miniſters had concluded a peace for ſeven years. Demoſthenes adviſed them to ſend and demand a ratification of the treaty before he paſſed the Pylæ, as alſo to perſuade him not to undertake a war againſt the Phocians. On the other hand, the Bœotians ſent to intreat him to continue his march and come ſpeedily to their aſſiſtance. Philip heard all the embaſſadors, and though their demands were diametrically oppoſite, he promiſed them all to do as they deſired, and thereby kept them in a ſtate of dependence, till he ſeized the poſt of Thermopylæ; then coming down with a mighty army into Locris in the third year of the hundred and eighth olympiad, he put an end to the ſacred war by his preſence only, for the Phocians, finding themſelves too weak to give him battle, made a treaty, whereby their general obtained leave leave to march away with ſuch as would follow him; the reſt were left to the mercy of Philip, who referred them to the Amphictyons, which great council, in return for this eminent ſervice, took from the Phocians their double voice, and gave it to Philip and his ſubjects, who till then had no voice at all. Returning crowned with glory into his own country, he bent his arms firſt againſt the Illyrians, and ſoon after, when he conceived the Athenians unable to help them, he attempted to bring the Perynthians under his dominion. Perynthus was ſeated on the ſhore of Propontis, and, as it always favoured the Athenians, had incurred the Macedonian's high diſpleaſure. The inhabitants, however, were not eaſily ſubdued, they had learned from the Athenians to ſet a high value on their liberty, and prepared to defend themſelves valiantly, when they heard that Philip was marching againſt them. The Perſian king beginning to doubt the deſigns of the Macedonian, whoſe anceſtors had been his tributaries, gave inſtructions to his lieutenants, who were neareſt Perynthus, to favour the inhabitants as much as poſſible; the Byzantines alſo, doubting much the intentions of Philip, ſent Perynthus a very great ſupply, inſomuch, that they not a little weakened their own forces, of which Philip having intelligence, he left part of his army to block up Perynthus, and marched at the head of the reſt to ſurprize or beſiege Byzantium; at the news of this the Athenians were indeed affrighted; they therefore decreed, that ſuccours ſhould be immediately ſent, and with more than ordinary care put it in the power of Chares, who was elected general, to ſail with a good fleet and a numerous army to the aſſiſtance of the Byzantines; yet this effected nothing, for when the fleet appeared off of Byzantium, the inhabitants of that city refuſed to let it enter their port, having before experienced the worth of the Athenian admiral, and knowing him to be no better than a pyrate with a commiſſion. Chares having dreſſed this refuſal in the worſt colours poſſible, diſpatched advice of it home, where it put the Athenians into a mighty chafe, and cauſed many of them to ſay in the aſſembly, that it was a pity they had aſſiſted the Byzantines at all; upon which Phocion riſing up addreſſed them in the following conciſe terms: My maſters, you ought not ſo much to blame the jealouſy of your allies, as the baſe behaviour of your generals, who have rendered you ſuſpected even to thoſe who are unable to ſupport themſelves without your aſſiſtance. Upon this the people with their uſual inconſtancy dropped their former opinion, and unanimouſly choſe Phocion general, who, immediately ſailing to the Helleſpont, received the command of the fleet from Chares, and again appeared before Byzantium, landed his forces, and would have encamped without the city; but the Byzantines would by no means permit it, ſetting open their gates, and joyfully receiving the Athenians when they had Phocion for their general, who quickly obliged Philip to return to his own dominions, took many of his ſhips, recovered ſeveral places into which he had put gariſons, and exceedingly haraſſed the frontiers of his kingdom, ſo that it appeared, that the Macedonian was not invincible when oppoſed by a man of probity as well as of abilities [a].

[z] Diodor. lib. xvi. Plut. in vit. Demoſt. & Phocion. Juſtin. lib. ix. Demoſt. Olynth. & Philip.

SOMETIME after this the Megarians privately fought the friendſhip of the Athenians. Phocion, being apprehenſive that the Bœotians would exert themſelves to prevent this union, cauſed an aſſembly to be called very early in the morning; where having preſented the petition from Megara and backed it with great warmth, the Athenians came into it very readily; whereupon he made proclamation, that all ſuch as would go on this expedition ſhould immediately aſſemble in arms, and a great number preſenting themſelves very readily, he without more ado put himſelf at their head, and marched directly away to Megara, where he was very joyfully received. He re-edified the long walls, joining that city to its port Niſæa, and thereby effectually ſecured it to the Athenians; after this he was ſent again among the iſlands to regulate all things for the intereſt of his country. Philip in the mean time neglected nothing which might either tend to the raiſeing of his own power, or depreſſing that of the Greek ſtates; but, above all deſiring to humble the Athenians, he came ſuddenly down to Phocis, and having ſeized Elatæa, he there aſſembled a mighty army with a reſolution to invade Attica, for which purpoſe there was an abſolute neceſſity of paſſing through Bœotia; the Athenians upon this were in the utmoſt confuſion, ſo that Demoſthenes had need of all his eloquence to keep up their ſpirits; at laſt, however, he prevailed upon them to declare declare war againſt Philip, and to ſend to the Bœotians to intreat them to ſtand faſt for the liberty of Greece; he alſo engaged them to raiſe a very conſiderable army in an inſtant, and to chuſe Chares and Lyſicles generals, who without more ado marched into Bœotia, where they were kindly received and promiſed all things. Philip, however, reſolving to have as few enemies as he could to deal with, ſent Python into Bœotia to perſuade the people of that country to be quiet; to him the Athenians oppoſed Demoſthenes, whoſe eloquence prevailing, the Bœotians joined their utmoſt force with the Athenians, and reſolved to hazard all in a general engagement. Demoſthenes magnified this at Athens as a mighty ſtroke of policy, becauſe he put the war at a diſtance from Attica, to which Phocion ſhrewdly replied; Let us not be ſo careful about the place where we are to engage, as how to get the victory; that is the only way to keep the war at a diſtance; whereas, if we are overcome, the very worſt of calamities will be ſoon at our doors. Phocion had the reſolution alſo to expreſs at the ſame time a diſlike of the war and a doubtfulneſs of its event, nay even to propoſe an accommodation and the renewing of the peace with Philip, when an Athenian of very bad character cried out, Dareſt thou, Phocion, think of diſſuading the Athenians from the war, now the ſword is drawn? Yes, I dare, returned he, though I know that in time of war I ſhall always be thy maſter, whereas in peace thou perhaps may be mine. The event ſhewed how juſt a notion Phocion had of things, for Philip coming down at laſt with an army of thirty thouſand foot and two thouſand horſe, the Athenians and Bœotians met him at Chæronæa. In this battle, which began at the riſing of the ſun, Alexander commanded one wing, and his father the other; the confederate army was divided according to the nations of which it conſiſted, the Athenians having the right, and the Bœotians the left; at the beginning the confederates had the better, whereupon Stratocles an Athenian commander cried out, Come on, brother ſoldiers, let us drive them back to Macedon; which king Philip hearing, ſaid very coolly to one of his officers, Theſe Athenians do not know how to conquer. Whereupon he directed the files of his phalanx to be ſtreightened, and drawing his men up very cloſe, retired to an eminence hard by, from whence, when the Athenians were eager in their purſuit, he came down like thunder, broke, and routed them with prodigious ſlaughter. Demoſthenes acted very unbecomingly in this engagement, for he deſerted his poſt, and was one of the firſt that fled. Philip did not preſerve that wiſdom after his victory which he had ſhewn in the fight; for he danced about like one diſtracted with joy, and comeing up to the band of Athenian priſoners, treated them with ſcoffs and ill language; upon which Demades, who was one of them could not help reproving him: Since fortune, O Philip, ſaid he, ſeems to have aſſigned thee the part of Agamemnon, why wilt thou play Therſites? At which Philip bluſhing ordered him to be immediately releaſed, and diſcharged likewiſe the reſt of the Athenian captives, who ſending afterwards to demand their baggage, Philip ſaid laughing, I believe theſe people don't think we beat them in earneſt. He ordered them, however, to be given them; he likewiſe ſent embaſſadors to Athens to renew the peace, which was done. After this Philip convoked a general aſſembly of the Greeks, into which Demades perſuaded the Athenians to inſiſt on being received. Phocion oppoſed it, alledging, that they ought firſt to be informed what Philip would demand in that aſſembly; however, it was carried againſt him; but when it afterwards appeared, that the Athenians were by this raſh ſtep obliged to furniſh the king with a body of horſe and a ſquadron of ſhips, they repented their meddling at all, and reproached in the aſſembly Demades and the other orators, who were ſo forward in the buſineſs, expreſſing at the ſame time a doubt, whether they ought to comply with articles ſo unworthy of the Athenian ſtate. Phocion upon this ſtood up again, I foreſaw, gentlemen, ſaid he, what would happen, and therefore I was againſt this ſtep when it was firſt propoſed; but ſince it is once taken, I am for it, and adviſe you to bear it as well as you can, always remembering the conduct of your anceſtors, who ſuited their behaviour to their fortune; ſometimes giving laws, ſometimes receiving them, but doing both with a good grace, whereby they not only preſerved their own city, but alſo all Greece. The kindneſs expreſſed by the king towards the Athenians was not over ſincere, ſince he doubted ſo far of them, as to require, on the marriage of his daughter Cleopatra, that a deputy ſhould be ſent from them with a gold crown, as from the reſt of the cities, which was accordingly done, and preſented to him in the midſt of the marriage ſolemnities, with this remarkable compliment; that if any conſpira-

[a] Diodor. Plut. Juſt. ubi ſupra.

tor

tor againſt Philip fled to Athens he ſhould be delivered up. At this marriage, however, Philip was murdered, which gave a new turn to affairs at Athens; Demoſthenes and his party making great rejoicings, wearing chaplets of flowers, and behaving as if they had gained a great victory, which Phocion reprehended, bidding them remember, that the army, which had beat them at Chæronæa, was leſſened but by one. This reproof, however grave, however poignant, had little effect; the very people who put Lyſicles their general to death, merely becauſe he was ſo unlucky as to command them in that battle, who directed Demoſthenes to exalt the memory of thoſe who fell therein in a funeral oration, who in contradiction to theſe meaſures had juſt now flattered the king by ſending him a crown of gold, ran again into the ſame extravagancies, and heard with pleaſure all the harſh things the orators could ſay of the young Alexander, whom they repreſented as a giddy wrong-headed boy, ready to graſp all things in his imagination, and able to perform nothing; but he ſoon gave them occaſion to underſtand, that they were mightily miſtaken by his quick diſſolution of that confederacy which they formed, not only for depriving him of the command of Greece, but even of his hereditary dominions; for Demoſthenes taking pains to inſpire all the ſtates with high notions of liberty, the Ætolians firſt of all made a decree to recal the exiles whom Philip had driven out of their country. The Ambraciots drove out the Macedonian gariſon, the Thebans caſt out that which had been eſtabliſhed in the citadel, the Arcadians, as they had refuſed to give their votes for Philip's becoming general of Greece, ſo they now rejected Alexander; the Argives, Eleans, Lacedæmonians, and others in Peloponneſus, all ſpoke the ſame language, and all determined to throw off that yoke which the Macedonians had impoſed; they likewiſe treated with Attalus, Alexander's uncle, who aſpired to the kingdom, to favour his pretenſions; ſo that if the ſon of Philip had really been as weak as the Athenian orators would have repreſented him, he muſt have been cruſhed by ſuch a load of oppoſition; but he, far from being diſmayed, came firſt into the council of the Amphictyons, where he procured himſelf to be recognized general of Greece. He then marched immediately towards Thebes with a numerous army, ſacked, and plundered it, and thereby ſtruck ſuch a terror into the reſt of the confederates, that no-body durſt oppoſe him. As to the Athenians, he refuſed to admit them into his favour, unleſs they delivered up to him Demoſthenes, and, as ſome ſay, nine more of their orators; other hiſtorians ſay, but ſeven. This ſtruck the aſſembly with the utmoſt terror, none knowing what to ſay, or what to propoſe; at laſt they called upon Phocion and deſired his opinion, upon which, ariſing up and pointing to his friend Nicocles: Theſe perſons, ſaid he, whom Alexander demands of you, are they who have brought you into theſe miſerable circumſtances; circumſtances ſo miſerable, that if he demanded that friend of mine, I ſhould adviſe you to deliver him innocent as he is. As for my own life, if that would purchaſe your ſafety, I would reſign it chearfully; but truly it pierces my heart, that thoſe who have fled for ſuccour from the deſolation of Thebes, ſhould have ſo little hopes of ſafety here; ſurely it would be more for our intereſt to pacify the conqueror in time, and to intercede for both cities, than to hazard another battle: Demoſthenes contented himſelf with ſaying, that once on a time the wolves offered to make peace with the ſheep, but firſt, ſaid he, they would have them give up their dogs. The ſtream, however, was too ſtrong, and therefore he and his party were forced to give way. The firſt decree which the Athenians paſſed for making peace and which they ſent to Alexander, he would not deign to take notice of, but turned his back upon the embaſſadors, as if they had not been worthy of his notice; but when Phocion preſented the ſecond decree, he received him very graciouſly, and not only granted him his requeſts, but liſtened to his advice, nay he had the complaiſance to tell him at parting; Your Athenians ought to have their eyes about them, for, if I ſhould miſcarry, they only are worthy to command. The friendſhip which Alexander contracted with this general, was not broke off or interrupted by his expedition into Aſia; on the contrary, he wrote to him frequently, offered him mighty preſents, and even his choice of four cities; nay, what was ſtill a greater mark of his regard, when he no longer uſed in his letters the phraſe of Alexander wiſhes health, he preſerved it to him and Antipater, as if they had been his equals. When that conqueror had occaſion for gallies to complete his fleet, he ſent to demand thoſe which had been promiſed him by the Athenians; the orators, as they were wont, oppoſed this as derogatory to their freedom; at laſt Phocion being required to ſpeak, delivered his ſentiments freely, which were, that the gallies ſhould be immediately ſent; For, ſaid he, till you can put your ſelves at the head of Greece, I would have you the friends of thoſe who are at the head of it. Harpalus, one of Alexander's commanders, having in ſeveral reſpects failed in his duty, and dreading the reſentment of his prince, fled with an immenſe quantity of treaſure, which he had amaſſed together out of the ſpoils of Aſia. Athens was the city of Greece he thought the moſt proper place for his retreat, and therefore thither he came and brought his plunder along with him, not doubting, that, ſince he came laden with wealth, he ſhould meet with friends enough to be purchaſed. Accordingly moſt of the orators came flocking about him, to know how they might be ſerviceable, and upon what terms; as for Demoſthenes, his good ſenſe engaged him to make a warm oration againſt receiving a perſon who was little better than a thief, and thereby involving the commonwealth in a war, at once dangerous and unjuſt; but a few days after, when the treaſure was publickly brought aſhore and laid up, Demoſthenes being preſent took notice of the king's golden cup, whereupon Harpalus deſired him to poize it in his hand, and conſider its weight; which he did, and then aſked the price of it; To you, Sir (ſaid Harpalus) it ſhall come with twenty talents; at night accordingly it was ſent, and Demoſthenes, when he was called upon the next day in the aſſembly to deliver his opinion, ſhewed his neck, which was ſwathed round with ſeveral rollers, and made ſigns, that he was unable to ſpeak, upon which ſome of the wits ſaid, The orator had got a ſilver quinſey. As for Phocion, Harpalus knew well that he was of another diſpoſition, and therefore he ſent him no leſs than ſeven hundred talents, and offered to commit himſelf and all his affairs to his diſpoſal; but Phocion treated thoſe who came to him very roughly, and threatened not to be content with words, if he went on thus to corrupt the people; when the matter came to be debated the laſt time in the aſſembly, thoſe who had received his money railed moſt at Harpalus to conceal their own guilt, whereas Phocion expreſſed a great regard for his misfortune, and treated him in ſuch gentle terms, that Harpalus again offered him money; but he was impregnable, and in the end the Athenians expelled the Macedonian the city, and ordered the court of Areopagus to take cognizance of ſuch as were impeached of bribery: which court dealt very ſeverely with them, and particularly fined Demoſthenes fifty talents, and ordered him to be impriſoned till it was paid, but he ſhortly after made his eſcape from thence and fled to

of

Ægina,

Ægina, where he remained till after the death of Alexander, which was no very long time [a].

THIS great event altered all the affairs of Greece; the Athenians had been much diſſatisfied with him, for deſigning to take from them Samos, in order to reſtore it to its antient inhabitants; and therefore, when Aſclepiades, the ſon of Hipparchus, brought the firſt news of it to Athens, the people ran immediately into the market-place, where many contradicted it, but the majority cried out, that what Aſclepiades had related was true. Phocion, fearing they would do ſome mad action or other, cried out, Well, ſuppoſe it is, if it be true to day, it will be true to morrow, ay, and the next day, ſo that we ſhall have time enough to deliberate coolly. The orators unanimouſly concurred in prompting the people to make war, and indeed all Greece was in commotion, ſo that at length it was carried by a great majority, that the Athenians ſhould take upon them the defence of the common liberty, ſhould free all the cities from their gariſons, ſhould fit out a fleet of two hundred and forty ſail, and that all men under forty years old ſhould take up arms. Leoſthenes was the commander, who drew together a very fine army, with which he marched againſt the Macedonians. Antipater, as ſoon as he had intelligence of this, ſent to Craterus in Cilicia to come to his aſſiſtance, but in the interim he marched into Theſſaly himſelf with 13000 foot, and 600 horſe. The Theſſalians joined him with a great body of cavalry; but when Leoſthenes approached, and it appeared, that the Athenians and their confederates were by far more numerous, the Theſſalians deſerted to them; yet Antipater had the courage to venture a battle, in which his troops were thoroughly beaten, and himſelf conſtrained to fly; but he ſhewed himſelf a great general in his flight, for arriving with ſome foot at Lamia a city in Theſſaly, he cauſed the place to be fortified, and received into it all his troops as faſt as they came up, ſo that he drew together again 8 or 9000 men, and prepared to make an obſtinate reſiſtance. Leoſthenes, coming up with the confederate army, inveſted and attacked this city, but finding that it could not be taken by ſtorm, he was conſtrained to make a regular ſiege: Antipater watching his opportunity, though he was every day attacked by freſh troops, made a ſally

[a] Diodor. lib. x. ii. Plut, in vit. Demoſth. & Phocion. Juſtin. lib. xi. & xii.

ſally upon the workmen, and put them in great diſorder. Leoſthenes, coming to encourage them, was unfortunately killed with a ſtone, which greatly diſpirited the Greeks; however, they choſe Antiphalus their general and continued the war, notwithſtanding Antipater had eſcaped out of Lamia; not long after they routed the Macedonians, under the command of Leonatus, which victory was their ruin; for ſlighting the Macedonians, many returned home to their reſpective cities. Antipater having joined the remains of Leonatus's army, and being joined afterwards by Craterus, who yielded to him the command, he ſoon after fought and routed the Greeks under the command of Antiphalus and Memnon: though there were but five hundred men ſlain in this battle, yet the confederates were ſo diſpirited that they ſent to Antipater to treat of peace; but Antipater refuſed to treat at all of a general peace, profeſſing at the ſame time, that he was willing to hear and receive embaſſadors from each of the cities, and to conſider their reſpective demands. At firſt the Grecians rejected this with ſcorn, but when ſeveral of the Theſſalian cities were taken by ſtorm, they were glad to treat upon the terms preſcribed, upon which Antipater received the embaſſadors very kindly, and granted almoſt every thing they deſired; thus the Athenians were deprived of all their confederates, and in a ſhort time reduced to the utmoſt extremity. In this diſtreſs Phocion with ſome of the orators were deputed to go to Cadmæa, where Antipater was encamped, to procure from him, if poſſible, an honourable peace; when they came thither, Phocion intreated that the terms might be adjuſted there, whereas Craterus was for marching into Attica, and treating with the Athenians, as it were at their own doors; ſaying it was unreaſonable to burden their friends with an army, while they were treating with enemies. Antipater replied, that what he ſaid was juſt; But yet, continued he, let us grant this favour to Phocion. In fine, a treaty was concluded, or rather Antipater impoſed upon the Athenians theſe conditions; that Demoſthenes and Hyperides ſhould be delivered up, that the antient way of raiſing taxes in the city ſhould be reſtored, that they ſhould receive a gariſon into Munichia, defray the charges of the war, and ſubmit to ſome other taxes. Phocion was very deſirous that they might be ſpared the gariſon; but Antipater anſwered, I will deny thee, Phocion, nothing, but what will inevitably tend to thy ruin and my own. In conſequence of this treaty, Menyllus, a man of great ſweetneſs of temper per and one of Phocion's friends, was ſent to command the gariſon, which entered Munichia; Demoſthenes in the mean time fled, fearing to be delivered up to Antipater; and being puſued by ſome perſons in that nobleman's ſervice, poiſoned himſelf (P). The Macedonian gariſon being

(P) As to the character and eloquence of Demoſthenes, we have ſpoken at large in the text; as to his works, the greateſt part of which have eſcaped the injuries of time, the reader is to expect an account of them elſewhere; in this note we have nothing in view, but his misfortunes and death, which to have related at length, would have broke in on the thread of our hiſtory, and to have paſſed over in few words, muſt have offended the peruſer. When he was baniſhed, that is voluntarily, by flying from priſon, ſome of his enemies followed him out of town; from theſe he endeavoured to hide himſelf, but they having him in view, kept cloſe to him, and at laſt coming near, called him by his name; and when he came out, exhorted him to bear his misfortunes patiently, and preſented him with a ſum of money for his ſupport; whereupon Demoſthenes broke out into a louder lamentation than ever, crying out, Alas, how ſhall I ſupport myſelf under ſo heavy an affliction, ſince I am forced to leave a city, where one's very enemies are more kind and generous than any friends I can hope to find elſewhere? To ſay the truth, his love for his country made him bear his exile but very indifferently, the greateſt part of which he ſpent either in Ægina or Trœzene, from whence he could ſee the coaſt of Attica, towards which he would frequently look with tears in his eyes; he had a juſt ſenſe, however, of the danger, to which wiſe men are expoſed in democratic governments; for looking once at the citadel, he could not help breaking out into this exclamation; O Goddeſs, Minerva, whence comes it, that thou delighteſt in three ſuch fierce and untractable creatures, the owl, the dragon, and the people. When Leoſthenes led the Greeks againſt Antipater, and endeavoured to prevent ſlavery from being induced by all the commanders of Alexander the great, Demoſthenes exerted his eloquence again, and was indefatigable in ſtirring up all the little ſtates to remain firm in their confederacy for ſupporting the Grecian liberty, amongſt the reſt, he travelled to the Arcadians, among whom one Pytheas an agent of the Macedonians was very buſy: this man, ſeeing the Athenian embaſſadors and Demoſthenes with them at a public aſſembly, could not help crying out, That as it is a certain ſign there is ſome diſeaſe in the family where aſſes milk is brought, ſo the coming of the Athenian embaſſy was a never-failing indication, that the city to which they came was indiſpoſed. Demoſthenes immediately retorted this compariſon. As aſſes milk, ſaid he, is never carried into ing ſettled in Athens, a great number of the lower citizens were disfranchiſed and ſent into Thrace, where Antipater aſſigned into a houſe, but with an intent to reſtore the health of thoſe who dwell therein ; ſo the Athenians never ſend their embaſſadors to any city, but with a view to cure it of thoſe diſtempers with which it is afflicted. On the report of this the Athenians inſtantly recalled him, found a means to ſatisfy his fine, and paid him the higheſt honours they could invent, but his proſperity was of a very ſhort continuance ; for in September the Greeks loſt the battle of Cranon, in October the Macedonian gariſon entered Athens, in November Demoſthenes fled to avoid death, which followed and overtook him the ſame month ; for one Archias a player having undertaken to Antipater to find him out, receiving intelligence, that he had taken ſanctuary in the temple of Neptune in the little iſland of Calauria, he paſſed over thither with a ſmall detachment of Thracian guards. When he found Demoſthenes, he would fain have perſuaded him to go with him to Antipater, aſſuring him, that he would receive no harſh treatment, which was very improbable, becauſe moſt of his friends were already murdered. To theſe fine ſpeeches therefore the Orator anſwered, O Archias, I was never much pleaſed with you as a player, and now I am as little moved by you as a negotiator. Archias beginning at this to grow angry and to threaten him ; Now, ſaid Demoſthenes, thou ſpeakeſt like the oracle of Macedon ; before thou didſt but act a part. Therefore forbear only a little, while I write a word or two home to my family. Having thus ſpoken he withdrew himſelf farther into the temple, and taking ſome paper as if he meant to write, he put the quill into his mouth, and biting it as he was wont to do when he was thoughtful or writing, he held it there for ſome time. Then he bowed down his head and covered it. The ſoldiers who ſtood at the door, ſuppoſing all this to proceed from puſillanimity, in deriſion called him effeminate faint-hearted coward. And Archias drawing near deſired him to riſe up, and repeating the ſame kind things he had ſaid before, he once more promiſed to make his peace with Antipater. But Demoſthenes, perceiving, that now the poiſon had pierced and ſeized his vitals, uncovered his head ; and fixing his eyes upon Archias, Now, ſaid he, as ſoon as you pleaſe you may act the part of Creon in the tragedy, and caſt out this body of mine unburied ; but, continued he, turning towards the altar, O gracious Neptune, I, for my own part, while I am yet alive, ariſe and depart out of this ſacred place, without profaning it ; but Antipater and the Macedonians have not left ſo much as thy temple unpolluted, but have defiled it by my death. After he had thus ſpoken, he deſired to be held up, becauſe already he began to tremble and ſtagger ; as he was going

aſſigned them a place to build a city, and lands to cultivate. In the mean time, political affairs were managed by men of the better ſort, and eſpecially by Phocion, who was in very high credit with Antipater and the Macedonians. He was for proceeding ſtill on his old maxim of complying with the times, and making no attempts beyond the reach of their power. Happy had it been for the Athenians, if they had gone into this way of thinking; but they were continually repining at the loſs of that power, which they knew not how to manage, abhorred the ſight of the Macedonian gariſon, which they knew not how to remove, and earneſtly longed for an alteration of circumſtances, though there was no reaſon to hope that ſuch an alteration would be for their benefit. They were continually preſſing Phocion to apply to Antipater for removing the gariſon, and at laſt finding all their ſollicitations in vain, they turned their eyes on Demades the orator, who was alſo in the Macedonian intereſt, and had been greatly favoured by Antipater. This man, willing to do the people a pleaſure, and at the ſame time to make a diſplay of his intereſt, readily undertook the propoſed embaſſy. This Athenian was a man of parts and eloquence, but probity and diſintereſtedneſs were not among the number of his good qualities, as we may gueſs from this ſaying of Antipater's, That he had two friends at Athens, Phocion and Demades, the former a man who would rceceive no ſatisfaction for the ſervices he did him, and the latter who would never be ſatisfied how much ſo ever he received. Whether Antipater had lately left off his liberality towards this orator, or whether Demades had reaſon to hope greater appointments from Perdiccas, who was Antipater's mortal enemy, is a point we cannot determine; but ſo it was, that Demades had entered into a correſpondence with Perdiccas, andhad put him upon invading Macedonia and Greece, and aſſuming the government of them himſelf, making uſe in one of his letters of this expreſſion, That at preſent they leaned on an old rotten ſtaff, meaning Antipater. It ſo fell out, that all theſe tranſactions, and particularly this very letter, were found out, while Demades and his ſon Demias were ſolliciting the recal of the gariſon; upon which Antipater ordered the ſon to be put to death, going forward and paſſing by the altar, he fell down, and with a groan gave up the ghoſt (3).

(3) Plutarch. in vit. Demoſthen. prope fin.

death, not only in the presence of the father, but in such a manner, that his blood flew all over him. After this Demades himself was put to death, and the Athenians left without hopes of ever seeing this bit taken out of their mouths [b].

Cassander seizes Athens Year after the Flood, 2681. Year before Christ, 318.

On the death of Antipater two factions sprung up in Macedonia, the one headed by Polyperchon, who had the custody of the persons of the kings, and the other by Cassander the son of Antipater; the latter sent Nicanor to command the garrison in Athens, a man of great art and a good soldier; with him Phocion often conversed, labouring all he could to persuade him to use the citizens kindly, and to leave the government in the same condition in which he found it; Polyperchon, on the other hand desiring to recover the Greek cities from his rival Cassander, published a decree in the king's name, restoring them all to freedom, particularly Athens, directing the garison immediately to withdraw from thence, and the democracy to be restored; this had its effect, for it put the Athenians all into confusion; Nicanor refused to obey the decree, and because Phocion corresponded with him afterwards, the people accused him of being an enemy to his country, whereas he desired nothing more than to see their liberty restored, which it was not likely to be on a bare decree unsupported by arms, Nicanor paying no respect to Polyperchon's orders. Not long after, Polyperchon came with the kings and a great army into Attica, or at least to the borders of Attica, whither Phocion was sent, and deputies from the Athenians to accuse him; Polyperchon, willing to keep up to the terms of that decree which he had published, sent back Phocion and his friends chained in carts, with this message, That though he was convinced they were traitors, yet he left them to be judged by the Athenians as a free people. As soon as there was silence made that he could be heard, Phocion demanded, whether they intended to proceed against them by form of law; and some crying out that they would, Phocion demanded how that could be, if they were not allowed a fair hearing; but perceiving by the clamour of the people, that no such thing was to be expected, he cried out, As for myself, I confess the crime objected to me, and submit myself to the judgment of the law; but consider, O ye Athenians, what have these poor poor innocent men done, that they ſhould be involved in the ſame calamity with me? The people at this cried aloud, They are your accomplices, and that is enough. Then the decree was read, adjudging them all to death, viz. Phocion, Nicocles, Theudippus, Agamon, and Pythocles; theſe were preſent; Demetrius Phalereus, Callimedon, Charicles, and others, were condemned in their abſence; ſome moved, that Phocion might be tortured before he was put to death; nay, they were for bringing the rack into the aſſembly, and torturing him there. The majority, however, thought it enough if he was put to death, for which the decree was carried unanimouſly, ſome putting on garlands of flowers when they gave their votes; as he was going to die, a perſon who was his intimate friend aſked him if he had any meſſage for his ſon, Yes, replyed Phocion, tell him, it is my laſt command, that he forget how ill the Athenians treated his father. The ſpleen of his enemies was not extinguiſhed with his death, they paſſed a decree, whereby his corſe was baniſhed the Athenian territories, they likewiſe forbad any Athenian to furniſh fire for the funeral pile. One Conopion an undertaker took up the corſe and carried it beyond Eleuſina, where he borrowed ſome fire of a Megarean woman and burned it. A Megarean matron, who attended with her maids, raiſed on the place an honorary monument, and having gathered up the bones carried them home, and buried them under her own hearth, praying at the ſame time thus to the Penates. To you, O ye gods, guardians of this place, I commit the precious remains of the moſt excellent Phocion; protect them, I beſeech you, from all inſults, and deliver them one day to be repoſited in the ſepulchre of his anceſtors, when the Athenians ſhall become wiſer. It was not long before this came to paſs, when the Athenians began to cool a little, and remember the many kindneſſes they had received from Phocion; they decreed him a ſtatue of braſs, ordered his bones to be brought back at the public expence, and decreed that his accuſers ſhould be put to death; Agnonides, who was principally concerned, ſuffered; but Epicurus and Demophilus, who were alſo concerned in it, fled; however, Phocion's ſon met with them, and executed his revenge upon them, which was almoſt the only good action he ever did, he having a very ſmall ſhare of his father's abilities, and none at all of his virtues. It was not long, however, before Caſſander came with a great great fleet into the port of Athens, and by the help of Nicanor, who commanded in the fort Munichia, reduced this city into ſuch ſtreights, that the Athenians were content to ſubmit to him upon theſe terms: that he ſhould leave a garriſon in the fort, and appoint ſome Athenian to preſide over the city. He accordingly placed Demetrius Phalereus in the office of governor, a man of great quality, being deſcended from Conon, and of great fortune, yet neither his birth nor fortune were equal to his virtue. He had ſtudied under the philoſopher Theophraſtus, and from him learned how to behave as an active as well as contemplative philoſopher; he treated the Athenians with the utmoſt kindneſs, and made uſe of that power, which he might eaſily have improved into a tyranny, to do thoſe things for them which their factions had hitherto hindred them from doing for themſelves. He encreaſed their public revenues, beautified their city with many magnificent ſtructures, reſtored ſuch as were in danger of falling through the injuries of time, and in every other reſpect gave ſuch ſignal teſtimonies of his tender affection for them, that the Athenians ſet up no leſs than three hundred ſtatues to his honour, moſt of them equeſtrian; but becauſe he derived his power from Caſſander, and they were not able to depoſe him at their pleaſure, they ſecretly hated him, of which we ſhall ſee many inſtances hereafter [c].

[b] Diodor. Sicul. lib. xviii. Plut. in vit. Demosth. & Phocion. Justin. lib. xxvi.

Demetrius Poliorcetes frees Athens. Year after the flood, 2692. Before Chriſt 307.

ANTIGONUS, the moſt magnanimous of Alexander's captains, and his ſon Demetrius Poliorcetes, i. e. the city-taker, having reſolved to free Greece from the yoke of Caſſander, determined to begin with Athens. The young prince Demetrius, who was the handſomeſt, and at the ſame time one of the braveſt, men of his time, took upon him the command in this expedition, which he executed with great facility; for hoiſting falſe colours he ſailed, without the leaſt oppoſition, into the port of Athens, where a multitude of people were aſſembled on the ſhore, who, when they diſcovered their miſtake, armed themſelves in haſte; but Demetrius quickly diſarmed them, not by force, but by fair words; for he cauſed a cryer to make proclamation, that he was come thither, by the command of his father, with no other deſign than to deliver them from the oppreſſion of Caſſander, to expel the garriſon which he had placed in the fort, and to reſtore to them their antient laws and government.

[c] Diodor. Plut. ubi ſupra. Juſtin.

The people immediately welcomed him with loud ſhouts, beſtowing on him the title of deliverer and benefactor. As for Demetrius Phalereus, he was in a moment deſerted, and the very next moment loaded with reproaches, and in danger of ſuffering death. He thereupon ſent one Ariſtodemus to Demetrius the ſon of Antigonus, to entreat a guard to protect him, and to beg leave of him to retire to Thebes: Demetrius received this meſſenger very reſpectfully, ſaid he came not to injure perſons of worth, and granted Demetrius both his requeſts; after this he blocked up the fortreſs of Munichia, and then departed to Megara, where Caſſander had alſo a garriſon; having ſet this place at liberty, he returned to Athens and attacked Munichia ſo briſkly, that he took it by aſſault; after which at the earneſt entreaty of the Athenians he entered the city in great pomp, and having ſummoned an aſſembly, he therein publicly declared, that he did not only freely reſtore them to their former popular government, but that he would prevail on his father to beſtow on them fifteen thouſand meaſures of wheat, and ſuch a quantity of timber as would enable them to build a hundred gallies for the defence of their city. Theſe mighty favours the Athenians repaid with moſt unmanly flattery, for they beſtowed on Antigonus and Demetrius not only the title of kings, which hitherto they had not taken, but alſo ſtiled them tutelar deities and deliverers, and appointed a prieſt to them; and whereas they had till this time marked the year by the name of the firſt archon, they decreed, that for the future it ſhould be deſigned by the name of this prieſt. They cauſed the portraits of Antigonus and Demetrius to be placed among the number of their gods, they erected an altar where Demetrius firſt alighted from his chariot, and ſtiled it the altar of the deſcent of Demetrius; they added two new tribes to the ten which already ſubſiſted, and called them Antigonides and Demetriades. To ſum up all, Stratocles propoſed and had it decreed, that, as often as they ſent embaſſadors to Antigonus and Demetrius, they ſhould be ſtiled embaſſadors of the gods; they changed the name of the month Munichian into Demetrian. It would be tedious to dwell on the reſt of the follies of this degenerate people, who, at the ſame time that they paid all this court to Antigonus and his ſon, paſſed a decree, whereby they adjudged Demetrius Phalereus to death, ordered all his ſtatues to be thrown down, and even ſent perſons to execute, as far as in them them lay, their decree, by endeavouring to way-lay and murder him, a practice which could not but give thoſe whom they now flattered to underſtand, that they would be ſure to deſert them, when they were deſerted by fortune. The democratic government was no ſooner reſtored in this city, than the effects of it were abundantly felt, accuſations were frequent, condemnations common, to be eminent induced danger, and to be low contempt. At the motion of Sophocles the people decreed, that no philoſophers ſhould teach unleſs licenſed by the ſenate and people, which occaſioned Theophraſtus the ſucceſſor of Ariſtotle to break up his ſchool. It is likely, that they were diſpleaſed with this great man, becauſe he was much in favour with Caſſander king of Macedon, and becauſe their late governor Demetrius Phalereus had been his ſcholar; however, their reſentment did not laſt long, for they afterwards reſcinded this decree, and recalled the philoſophers; but their protector Demetrius being engaged with all his force in the ſiege of Rhodes, Caſſander took this opportunity of vindicating his title to Greece, and coming with a powerful army to ſupport it, many of the cities revolted to him, ſo that in a ſhort ſpace he penetrated as far as Attica, and laid ſiege to Athens. The Athenians, thus diſtreſſed, ſent for aid to Demetrius, who came ſpeedily to their relief, and after obliging Caſſander to raiſe the ſiege, ſtript him in a very ſhort time of all his conqueſts. After this ſucceſs he put various cities under the power of the Athenians, and multiplied his good turns, as if he intended to overwhelm them with benefits. The Athenians in return racked their wits to deviſe new compliments and acts of flattery, ſtill ſuperior to thoſe which they performed before. They aſſigned Demetrius lodgings behind the temple of Minerva, in the apartments belonging to the virgins devoted to her ſervice; this was a ſcandalous inſult on religion, becauſe Demetrius was remarkably intemperate with reſpect to women. But the Athenians were ſo corrupt, that they gave way even to his unnatural luſts, which afforded an inſtance of private virtue worthy of being recorded to lateſt times. There lived now in Athens a young gentleman ſo remarkably handſome, that he was ſtiled the beautiful Damocles; him Demetrius purſued where-ever he appeared, ſo that the poor young man was conſtrained to avoid the public bathing-places and to go to a private bagnio; yet even thither Demetrius came, and ſurprized him alone in the bathing-room; the unhappy youth, with a courage never enough to be commended, threw off the cover of the chaldron, where the water was boiling for the bath, and leaping into it was ſtifled in a moment. It would have been unpardonable to have dwelt on ſuch particulars as theſe in any other period of the Athenian hiſtory; but the Athenians having now forgot to act, we are conſtrained to entertain the reader with what they ſaid, and having no more victories to ſpeak of, we are forced to record their flatteries. After all his mighty victories, Demetrius had a mind to be enrolled in the fraternity of the prieſts of Ceres, and admitted to all the myſteries. Now the conſtant practice in this caſe was, that he who deſired ſuch admiſſion was introduced as a novice in the leſſer myſteries in the month of November, and afterwards admitted to the greater in the month of Auguſt following: but when Demetrius ſignified his deſire it was the month of March. Stratocles furniſhed them with an invention which ſet all things to rights, and which ought everlaſtingly to be remembered to the diſhonour of this ſervile flattering people. He propoſed a decree and procured it to be paſſed, that the month of March ſhould become November; in conſequence of which, Demetrius was admitted to the leſſer myſteries: when this was over, Stratocles had it decreed, that the month before called November ſhould now be called Auguſt; and by virtue of this decree, Demetrius aſſiſted at the greater myſteries. Philippides the comedian could not help ſtigmatizing theſe mean compliances in the following diſtich:

What miracles by flatt'ry wrought are here,
Which in one month have crowded all the year!

THE pride with which the Athenians inſpired Demetrius and his father, drew upon them firſt the envy, and then a general confederacy of all the reſt of the ſucceſſors of Alexander againſt them; this obliged Demetrius to quit Greece and to go into Aſia, where in one battle his father Antigonus loſt his empire and his life, and Demetrius was conſtrained to ſail with a ſmall ſquadron of ſhips from Epheſus towards Athens, where he had left his queen Deidamia and great part of his navy; but in the iſlands called Cyclades he met with embaſſadors from that city, who informed him, that the Athenians had made a decree, that no crowned head ſhould enter their city; a moſt grateful decree indeed towards a man whom a little before they acknowledged for their ſaviour and their god! Demetrius did not, however, reſent this uſage with that warmth which might have been expected; he only deſired, that his ſhips

and

and his queen might be delivered to him, which was done; however, the Athenians were ſhortly after ſeverely puniſhed, for their ſeditions among themſelves encouraged one Lacharis to ſeize the ſovereignty, and to reduce the people to ſubmit to him, who was but an obſcure perſon, rather than live under the protection of ſo great princes; but when the affairs of Demetrius were a little reſtored, he began to think of humbling this inſolent and inconſtant people, who, to ſhew their ingratitude and contempt, paſſed a decree in full aſſembly, whereby they made it death for any perſon to propoſe a treaty or intercourſe with Demetrius on any pretence whatſoever. This rather irritated the king, than at all inclined him to lay aſide his firſt deſign. He therefore firſt began to interrupt the trade of Athens, and to ruin its territories; at laſt he cloſely beſieged the city; Lacharis in the mean time applied to Ptolemy, beſeeching ſome relief, for the Athenians were almoſt ſtarved, Demetrius puniſhing capitally ſuch as attempted to bring them proviſions; by degrees their diſtreſs grew ſo great, that a buſhel of ſalt was ſold for forty drachms, and a buſhel of wheat for three hundred. At laſt a hundred and fifty ſhips laden with corn came from Egypt, and anchored at Ægina in ſight of Athens; but Demetrius being at the ſame time reinforced with three hundred ſail from Cyprus and other places, the Egyptians cut their cables in the night and ſteered away. Lacharis, as ſoon as he was acquainted with this misfortune, privately quitted the city; and the Athenians, who had no choice but ſtarving or yielding, ſurrendered at diſcretion to Demetrius, who immediately entered the place with all his forces. He firſt of all commanded, that the Athenians ſhould all inſtantly aſſemble in the public theatre, which when they had done, he ſurrounded it with his guards, and ſo brought in a body of armed men, who were poſted round the ſtage. The people, trembling with fear, expected every moment when the ſignal ſhould be given for putting them to the ſword, when through the door made for the actors, Demetrius came upon the ſtage, where in a ſhort oration he gently reprehended their former ingratitude, and told them at the ſame time, that he would receive them again into his wonted grace and favour, as an inſtance of which he preſented them with an hundred thouſand buſhels of wheat, and named ſuch magiſtrates as were agreeable to the people. The Athenians immediately relapſed into their old ſtrain of flattery, their orators were all at work in contriving fine ſpeeches to celebrate the generoſity, and extol the clemency of this great prince, whoſe valour had acquired, whoſe abilities deſerved, and whoſe gentleneſs adorned the diadem he wore. Dromoclides, one of the ſpeakers on this occaſion, did him a much more acceptable ſervice than the reſt; for he, beſides his compliments, preferred a decree, whereby the haven of Pyræum and the caſtle of Munichia were given to the king, who was far from ſlighting ſo acceptable a preſent: he knew too well the ficklenеſs of that people to truſt them again, without taking ſome ſecurity for their behaviour; in Pyræum and Munichia therefore he placed garriſons by virtue of the decree, and in the Muſæum, becauſe it was convenient and fit for his purpoſe; thenceforward the Athenians were exceedingly faithful, eſpecially when Demetrius had poſſeſſed himſelf of the kingdom of Macedon; but when he was expelled from thence, and brought into ſuch circumſtances that he did not preſume to wear the habit of a king, the Athenians exerted their old ingratitude, degraded the prieſt of the two deities, and put all things into their old form. Sometime after their old maſter getting together an army, came and beſieged them, and reduced them to great ſtreights; they had then recourſe to Craterus the philoſopher, who went out to Demetrius, interceded with him, and ſo fully perſuaded him, that it would be more for his intereſt to paſs over into Aſia, that he left them in that liberty to which Olympiodorus had reſtored them [d].

Condition of Athens till freed by Aratus.

WHILE Lyſimachus, Seleucus, Ptolemy, and Softhenes held by turns the Macedonian kingdom, the Athenians remained free indeed, but without making any great figure; when the Gauls under the command of Brennus threatened the deſtruction of the Greeks in general, the Athenians for a time exerted ſomewhat of their ancient magnanimity, and under their general Calippus did great things; for then the common danger uniting all the Greeks, and even the king of Macedon himſelf, they had nothing to fear but the common enemy; but theſe dangers over, and the affairs of Antigonus Gonatus the ſon of Demetrius once in a proſperous way, the Athenians felt the weight of his power; for he, remembering how they had dealt with his father, reſolved to puniſh them for their former behaviour; and to make ſure of them for the future, he firſt waſted their territories, and afterwards cloſely beſieged Athens; at laſt unable unable to hold out, and unwilling to yield, they made the beſt treaty with him they could, and in conſequence thereof admitted a garriſon, whereby, though they flattered themſelves with the face of liberty, they became effectually his ſubjects, and after his death were left as ſuch to to his ſon Demetrius. About this time a ſpirit of liberty revived in Greece, and the Achæans, who were far from being a conſiderable people, not only defended their own freedom, but made it their buſineſs to free others, in which they were exceedingly aſſiſted by the mighty genius of Aratus the Sicyonian, one of the ableſt, and in all reſpects one of the honeſteſt men, that Greece or any other country produced; for he bent all his great qualities, and expended the vaſt riches which the fame of his virtue procured him, in doing good to others, without having a view to any other reward than the ſatisfaction of doing good; this diſpoſition of his, co-operating with the inclination of the Achæans, put him on two or three ſudden expeditions in order to ſurprize Athens, not with any intent to ſeize and keep it, but to ſet the people free; all which expeditions proved unfortunate, and it ſo happened, that in the laſt of them, his forces being diſperſed, he wandered about in the night, and with much ado got back to Corinth, while a report prevailed he was dead; upon which the Athenians in a giddy ingratitude put on garlands, as if it became citizens to rejoice for the death of their beſt friends; ſometime after, when Aratus was ſick in his bed, the Athenians ſuddenly reſolved they would be free, and, as if the greateſt men, and even nature herſelf, muſt ſubmit to their deſires, ſent for Aratus to come to their aſſiſtance; he thinking only of the merit of ſuch an action, and forgetting their former ingratitude, cauſed himſelf to be carried thither in a litter; and having prevailed on Diogenes the Macedonian governor to give up the three fortreſſes, Pyræum, Munichia, and Muſæum, for a hundred and fifty talents, he advanced twenty of them out of his own pocket, and then left the Athenians abſolutely free, having alſo the protection of the Achæans to guard their freedom. This happened in the beginning of the hundred and thirty-ſecond olympiad, two thouſand ſeven hundred and forty-ſeven years after the flood, and two hundred fifty-two years before Chriſt. Thus we have traced the hiſtory of the Athenians in a continued ſeries from their becoming a free people to their junction with the Achæans, which hitherto hath not

[d] Plut. in vit. Demet. Diogen. Laer. in vit. Theoph. Epicur. & Crat. Athen. in Deipnoſoph.

not been done in our language, nor, that we know of, in any other [e].

[e] Plut. in vit. Arat. Athen. in Deipnoſoph. Juſtin. lib. xxvi. c. 3.

CHAP. XIX.

The Hiſtory of Sparta from Lycurgus, to its being joined by Philopœmen to the Achæans.

The ſcope of this chapter.

WE are in this chapter to give the hiſtory of the Lacedæmonians, from the time of Lycurgus till they ceaſed to be an independent ſtate; that is, for a long ſeries of years, while they were the moſt conſiderable people in Greece, not from extent of territory, not from their numbers or wealth, not from the convenience of their ſituation, or in ſhort from any other accidental or external cauſe, but from their wiſdom and virtue, their valour, their moderation, their ſtrict regard to honour, their love of liberty, and contempt of luxury under all its various diſguiſes. The ſtability, as well as glory of the Lacedæmonian government was derived from the wiſe inſtitutions of Lycurgus, the celebrated law-giver of Sparta, with whoſe adminiſtration we are to begin this chapter; but, previous thereto, it will be neceſſary to continue the liſt of the kings of Sparta begun in our former ſection relating to the Lacedæmonian affairs, that we may preſerve the ſame order which has hitherto obtained throughout this work.

A TABLE of the Lacedæmonian Kings.

The Agidæ, or family of Agis.			The Proclidæ, or family of Procles.
xviii	Archelaus	60	xviii	Charilaus	64
xix	Teleclus	40	xix	Nicander
xx	Alcamenes	37	xx	Theompus
xxi	Polydorus		xxi	Zeuxidamus
xxii	Eurycrates		xxii	Anaxidamus
xxiii	Anaxander		xxiii	Archidamus
xxiv	Eurycrates		xxiv	Agaſicles
xxv	Leon		xxv	Ariſto

The

The Agidæ, or family of Agis.
xxvi	Anaxandrides
xxvii	Cleomenes
xxviii	Leonidas
xxix	Pliſtarchus	1
xxx	Pliſtonax	68
xxxi	Pauſanias	14
xxxii	Ageſipolis	14
xxxiii	Cleombrotus	9
xxxiv	Ageſipolis	1
xxxv	Cleomenes	61
xxxvi	Areus	44
xxxvii	Acrotatus
xxxviii	Areus	8
xxxix	Leonidas
xl	Cleombrotus	40
xli	Cleomenes

The Proclidæ, or family of Procles.
xxvi	Dæmaratus
xxvii	Leotychides	22
xxviii	Archidamus	42
xxix	Agis	42
xxx	Ageſilaus	41
xxxi	Archidamus	23
xxxii	Argis	9
xxxiii	Eudamidas
xxxiv	Archidamus
xxxv	Eudamidas
xxxvi	Agis
xxxvii	Furydamidas
xxxviii	Epiclidas

LYCURGUS at firſt held the crown in his own right, till it was known that his ſiſter-in-law the relict of Polydectus was with child; Lycurgus then declared, that he acted only as his guardian or protector who ſhould be born of the queen (in caſe ſhe ſhould be delivered of a ſon), which was a thing already common among the Spartans. The queen, who was an ambitious and profligate woman, privately intimated to Lycurgus, that ſhe would make uſe of means to make herſelf miſcarry, if he would promiſe to marry her. Lycurgus returned her many thanks, accepted a part of her propoſal, but entreated her not to hazard her own health by adventuring on any ſuch violent method, aſſuring her that for her ſake he would take the trouble of making away the child upon himſelf. The queen, amuſed by his fair ſpeeches, reckoned on her project as already accompliſhed when ſhe fell in labour, of which ſhe immediately gave notice to Lycurgus, who ſent ſome of his confidents to be preſent with inſtructions, if it was a ſon, to bring it to him, where-ever he was, or whatever he was about; but if it was a daughter, to deliver it to the women; accordingly, the queen being delivered of a boy, his agents brought it to him, where he was at ſupper with ſome of the principal perſons of the city. Lycurgus, taking the child in his arms, immediately produced him at the table, My Lords of Sparta, ſaid he, here is a king born unto us; then laying the child down on the chair of ſtate, when he obſerved that all who were preſent were extremely overjoyed at the ſight of ſo worthy and diſintereſted an action; he called the young prince Charilaus, i. e. the joy of the people. He then laid down all pretences to the royal authority, which he had exerciſed for about eight months, and took the title of protector only. This conduct of his, as it rendered him wonderfully beloved and admired by the people, ſo it exceedingly irritated the queen with all her family and faction; inſomuch, that they immediately began to calumniate Lycurgus, and to alledge, that notwithſtanding all this fair ſhew, he intended nothing leſs than to reſign the crown to his nephew; nay, Leonidas, the brother of the queen, had the aſſurance to tell him in a diſpute which happened between them, that he was confident it would not be long before he ſhould ſee him king. The queen likewiſe pretended much concern on the ſame account, and bewailed to her attendants the fate of her unhappy child. Lycurgus, greatly alarmed at theſe practices, and deſiring to avoid not only evil, but the very ſuſpicion of evil, reſolved to ſtifle the voice of malice itſelf by going into a voluntary exile, which reſolution he carried into execution ſoon afterwards, notwithſtanding all the entreaties of the people.

The wiſe conduct of Lycurgus, protector of Sparta.

who

The injuries which he had received, and the baſe conſtructions which had been put on his beſt actions, did not hinder Lycurgus from applying himſelf, with the ſame diligence abroad, to the ſtudy of that ſcience which might render him uſeful to his country, that he was wont to practice while at home; to this end he devoted all his travels, and like a true patriot was careful, that neither time nor place ſhould alter his attachment to his fellow citizens. Full of theſe noble conceptions he firſt viſited Crete, an iſland famous in the moſt antient times for the laws whereby it was governed, and for that artful polity which had been eſtabliſhed there in the moſt early ages. As far as can be gathered from Plutarch, it was at this time governed by ſeveral princes, or was at leaſt cantoned into various independent ſtates, through all which Lycurgus travelled, procuring to himſelf the acquaintance of perſons of the firſt rank, and by their means a perfect knowledge of their laws; ſome of which he greatly approved, others he ſlighted. Amongſt all the friendſhips which he contracted in Crete, that which ſtood him in moſt ſtead was his intimacy with Thales the Lyric poet, whom he perſuaded to be the companion of his voyages, and afterwards to return with him to Sparta; this poet was not a writer of amorous or drunken ſongs, ſongs, but one who made uſe of the ſweetneſs of poetic numbers to recommend temperance, modeſty, obedience, and civil harmony, and whoſe ſongs paved the way to the admiſſion of Lycurgus's laws, by removing that ferocity and querulous diſpoſition to which the Lacedæmonians had till then been addicted. From Crete Lycurgus paſſed over to the continent of Aſia, that he might philoſophize on the Ionian mode of life, which differed greatly from the Cretan. Here, as Plutarch conjectures, this noble enquirer after truth and virtue found the works of Homer, which he eagerly tranſcribed and brought over with him into Greece, whereas yet they had only ſcattered epiſodes of that famous author's poems, which were, however, highly eſteemed. From Ionia Lycurgus went into Egypt, a place never forgot by ſuch as went in queſt of wiſdom, and there he met with that method of diſtinguiſhing military men from mechanics, which he afterwards introduced at Sparta. As to his voyages to Spain, Afric, and the Indies, Plutarch ſays, the credit of them reſts ſolely upon one author; at this diſtance of time therefore we can affirm nothing about them. Inſtead of entering into a field of conjectures, from whence it might be difficult to get out, we will paſs to the affairs of Sparta during his abſence [a].

THE inhabitants of Lacedæmon, being in their nature bold and turbulent, were continually quarrelling amongſt themſelves, or treſpaſſing on the prerogative of their princes; the kings, on the other hand, ſometimes joining with the prevailing faction, practiſed a kind of tyranny, and at other times had much ado to ſupport a legal authority; theſe confuſions were greater or leſs, according as the princes were men of parts or otherwiſe. At this ſame time neither of the kings had any ſhining genius, Archelaus had the moſt wit, but Charilaus was the better man, more affable, and more beloved; the people, however, regarded neither of them ſo much as they did Lycurgus; wherefore taking it in their heads that many things went wrong, and that in ſhort the whole frame of the government was out of order ſince this great man's departure, they ſent embaſſadors to ſollicit him to return, which embaſſadors told him, that though they had indeed kings, whom their birth, their title, and their robes, ſhewed to be ſuch, yet as to royal qualities, and that diſpoſition of the mind which deſerves to rule, they had obſerved nothing among them ſince his departure of that

[a] Plut. in vit. Lycurg.

that kind. We uſe the words of Plutarch, who obſerves farther, that though this language ſeemed to bear a little hard upon the princes, yet they were far from being averſe to his return, hoping, that his preſence would ſerve as a bulwark to ſcreen them from the growing inſolence of the people. To gratify the unanimous voice of his fellow citizens, Lycurgus ſhaped his courſe homewards, in order to put in practice that wiſdom, which with ſo much induſtry and pains he had acquired. On his arrival at Sparta he found all things in a very bad way, the people mutinous, the kings timorous, and no middle rank of people who durſt interpoſe between them. He acted in this caſe like a great phyſician; for knowing that palliatives would do little or nothing, he reſolved to alter the whole political conſtitution, in order to introduce health by thoroughly purging out all peccant humours. A glorious undertaking, but attended with mighty difficulties and no leſs dangers! To ſurmount theſe, and to avoid thoſe, he endeavoured firſt to gain the confidence of the moſt eminent men of Sparta, by communicating to them his ſcheme, and ſhewing them the reaſons upon which it was founded; and ſecondly, he ſought to ſecure the obedience of the people, by pretending to the ſanction of divinity, and aſcribing all he did to the counſels of Delphian Apollo. Having made a journey to Delphi, and there offered ſacrifice, he returned with an oracle, which ſtiled him, Beloved of God, and rather God than man; declared the laws he had framed perfectly good, and promiſed to make the commonwealth, wherein they were obſerved, the moſt famous in the world. This divine manifeſto having wonderfully awed the people, the next thing he had to do was to publiſh theſe laws, which that he might perform with ſecurity, he appointed thirty of his friends to appear by break of day armed in the market-place; but of theſe twenty-eight only appeared. At the news of theſe preparations, Charilaus, who though honeſt, was very timid, fled to the temple of Minerva the protectreſs, fearing that it was ſome conſpiracy againſt his perſon; but when Lycurgus ſent to inform him of his real deſign, the king not only quitted the ſanctuary, but repaired to the market-place and entered into the confederacy. The firſt ſtep taken was the eſtabliſhing a ſenate conſiſting of twenty eight perſons, or of thirty including the two kings; this alone was of very great conſequence, ſince it fixed the form of the government, which had hitherto fluctuated between tyranny and democracy; the ſenate poiſing the authority both

both of the kings and of the people, ſiding with the former, if the latter were ſeditious, and with the latter, if the former were too enterprizing. That the people might not apprehend their condition to be worſe than it was before, Lycurgus allowed them to meet in a general aſſembly, which was to be held ſub dio, and wherein they were not allowed to deliberate, but had barely a power of aſſenting or diſſenting to or from what the kings and ſenate propoſed.

When Lycurgus by conſtituting a ſenate had ſecured to himſelf an acceſſion of power, he proceeded entirely to new-model the commonwealth, and to adjuſt all things to the ſcheme he had formed, without any reſpect whatſoever to their former ſtate and condition; a mighty project, which if we conſider, and take at the ſame time a ſtrict view of thoſe laws which he introduced, we ſhall have a juſt idea of his mighty genius, of the form of the Spartan government, and of the means whereby a ſtate, which was not conſiderable either for the number or wealth of its people, maintained itſelf ſo long in the ſovereignty of Greece. We have the rather taken upon us to enter into a diſtinct detail of the laws of Lycurgus, becauſe hitherto only general and imperfect accounts of the Spartan republic have been inſerted in our hiſtories of Greece, and even in books relating more ſtrictly to politics; whereas we ſhall make it evident, that theſe ſuperficial draughts of a conſtitution are by no means ſufficient to give us a juſt idea of its force and effects. The laws of Lycurgus may be properly divided into twelve tables, according to the ſubjects of which they treated, and by a proper attendance to the contents of theſe tables, we ſhall come at that perfect notion of Lycurgus's ſcheme, which is abſolutely neceſſary for the thorough underſtanding of the Lacedæmonian hiſtory.

In the firſt table we ſhall comprehend ſuch of the Spartan laws as regarded religion. The ſtatues of all the gods and goddeſſes worſhipped by this people were repreſented armed, even to Venus herſelf; the reaſon of which was, that the people might conceive a military life the moſt noble and honourable, and not attribute, as other nations did, ſloth and luxury to the gods. As to ſacrifices, they conſiſted of things of very ſmall value; for which Lycurgus himſelf gave this reaſon, that want might never hinder them from worſhipping the gods. They were forbidden to make long or raſh prayers to the heavenly powers, and were enjoined to aſk no more than that they might live honeſtly and diſcharge their duty. Graves were permitted to be made within the bounds of the city, contrary to the cuſtom of moſt of the Greek nations; nay, they buried cloſe by their temples, that all degrees of people might be made familiar with death, and not conceive it ſuch a dreadful thing as it was generally eſteemed elſewhere; on the ſame account the touching of dead bodies, or aſſiſting at funerals, made none unclean, but were held to be as innocent and honourable duties as any other. As to the mode of burying, it was alſo rendered ſimple and unexpenſive by law, there was nothing thrown into the grave with the dead body, magnificent ſepulchres were forbidden, neither was there ſo much as an inſcription, however plain or modeſt, permitted. Tears, ſighs, outcries, were not permitted in public, becauſe they were thought diſhonourable in Spartans, whom their law-giver would have to bear all things with equanimity. Mournings were ſtinted to eleven days, on the twelfth the mourner ſacrificed to Ceres, and threw aſide his or her weeds. In favour of ſuch as were ſlain in the wars, however, and of women who devoted themſelves to a religious life, there was an exception allowed as to the rules before-mentioned, for ſuch had a ſhort and decent inſcription on their tombs. When a number of Spartans fell in battle at a diſtance from their country, many of them were buried together under one common tomb; but if they fell on the frontiers of their own ſtate, then their bodies were carefully carried back to Sparta, and interred in their family ſepulchres.

made

UNDER the ſecond table let us place the ſtatutes relating to the lands and to the city; Lycurgus divided all the country of Laconia into thirty thouſand equal ſhares; the city of Sparta he divided into nine thouſand, as ſome ſay, into ſix thouſand, as ſay others; and, as a third party will have it, into four thouſand five hundred. The intent of the legiſlator was, that property ſhould be equally divided amongſt his citizens, ſo that none might be powerful enough to oppreſs his fellows, or any be in ſuch neceſſity as to be therefrom in danger of corruption; with the ſame view he forbad the buying or ſelling of theſe poſſeſſions; if a ſtranger acquired a right to any of theſe ſhares, he might quietly enjoy it, provided he ſubmitted to the laws of the republic. The city of Sparta was unwalled, Lycurgus truſting it rather to the virtue of its citizens, than to the art of maſons. As to the houſes, they were very plain, for their cielings could only be wrought by the ax, and their gates and doors only only by the ſaw, and their utenſils were to be of a likeſtamp, that luxury might have no inſtruments amongſt them.

As to the third table, it ſhall conſiſt of the laws regarding citizens. In the firſt place they were to be neither more nor leſs than the number of city-lots; and if at any time there happened to be more, they were to be led out in colonies: as to children, their laws were equally harſh and unreaſonable; for a father was directed to carry his new-born ſon to a certain place, where the graveſt men of his tribe looked upon the infant, and if they perceived its limbs ſtrait and thought it had a wholeſome look, then they returned it to its parent to be educated, otherwiſe it was thrown into a deep cavern at the foot of the mountain Taygetus. This law ſeems to have had one very good effect, viz. making women very careful, when they were with child, of either eating, drinking, or exerciſing to exceſs; it made them alſo excellent nurſes, for which they were in mighty requeſt throughout Greece. Strangers were not allowed to reſide long in the city, that they might not corrupt the Spartans by teaching them new-fangled cuſtoms. Citizens were alſo forbid to travel for the ſame reaſon, unleſs the good of the ſtate required it. Such as were not bred up in their youth according to the law, were not allowed the liberty of the city, becauſe they held it unreaſonable, that one who had not ſubmitted to the laws in his youth, ſhould receive the benefit of them when a man. They never preferred any ſtranger to a public office, but if at any time they had occaſion for a perſon not born a Spartan, they firſt made him a citizen, and then preferred him.

THEIR laws relating to marriage ſhall be comprehended under the fourth table. Celibacy in men was infamous, and puniſhed in a moſt extraordinary manner; for, in the firſt place, the old batchelor was conſtrained to walk naked in the depth of winter through the market-place: Secondly, while he did this, he was obliged to ſing a ſong in diſparagement of himſelf; and, thirdly, he had none of the honours paid him which otherwiſe belonged to old age, it being held unreaſonable, that the youth ſhould venerate him, who was reſolved to leave none of his progeny behind him to revere them when they grew old in their turns. The time of marriage was alſo fixed, and if a man did not marry when he was of full age, he was liable to an action; as were ſuch alſo as married above or below themſelves; ſuch as had three children had great immunities; ſuch as had four were free from all taxes whatſoever. Virgins were married without portions, becauſe neither want ſhould hinder a man, nor riches induce him, to marry contrary to his inclinations. When a marriage was agreed on, the huſband committed a kind of rape upon his bride, who was not a tender raw girl, but one in the flower of her age, and fit to bring healthy children. Huſbands went for a long time ſecretly, and by ſtealth, to the beds of their wives, that their love might not be quickly and eaſily extinguiſhed. Huſbands were allowed to lend their wives, but the kings, however, were forbid to take this liberty; ſome other laws of the like nature there were, which it is not neceſſary for us to dwell on, becauſe, as they were evidently againſt modeſty, ſo they were far from producing the ends for which Lycurgus deſigned them, ſince, though the men of Sparta were generally remarkable for their virtue, the Spartan women were as generally decried for their boldneſs and contempt of decency.

UNDER the fifth table ſhall ſtand the laws relating to eating. It was the care of Lycurgus, that from their very nonage and infancy the Lacedæmonians ſhould be inured to conquer their appetites; for this reaſon he directed, that nurſes ſhould accuſtom their children to ſpare meals, and now and then to faſting; that they ſhould carry them when twelve or thirteen years old to thoſe who ſhould examine their education, and who ſhould carefully obſerve, whether they were able to be in the dark alone, and whether they had got over all other follies and weakneſſes incident to children. He directed, that children of all ranks ſhould be brought up in the ſame way, and that none ſhould be more favoured in food than another, that they might not even in their infancy perceive any difference between poverty and riches, but conſider each other as equals, and even as brethren, to whom the ſame portions were aſſigned, and who through the courſe of their lives were to fare alike. Only youths were allowed to eat fleſh, older men eat their black broth and pulſe, the lads ſlept together in chambers, and after a manner ſomewhat reſembling that ſtill in uſe in Turkey for the Janizaries; their beds in the ſummer were very hard, being compoſed of the reeds plucked by the hand from the banks of the Eurotas; in winter their beds were ſofter, but by no means downy or fit to indulge immoderate ſleep. They eat altogether in public, and in caſe any abſtained from coming to the tables they were fined. Xenophon ſeems to have penetrated farther into the reaſon of this inſtitution than any other author, as indeed indeed he had better opportunity to do; for, whereas the reſt ſay, that this was only intended to repreſs luxury, he very wiſely remarks, that it was alſo intended to ſerve for a kind of ſchool or academy, where the young were inſtructed by the old, the former relating the great things that had been performed in their memory, and exciting the growing generation therefrom to perform great things alſo. It was alſo ſtrictly forbidden for any to eat or drink at home before they came to the common meal; even then each had his proper portion, that every thing might be done there with gravity and decency; the black broth was the great rarity of the Spartans, which was compoſed of ſalt, vinegar, blood, &c. ſo that in our times it would be eſteemed a very unſavoury ſoop. If they were modeſt in their eating, they were ſo alſo in their drinking; thirſt was the ſole meaſure thereof, and never any Lacedæmonian thought of drinking for pleaſure; as for drunkenneſs it was both infamous and ſeverely puniſhed; and that young men might perceive with how great reaſon, ſlaves were compelled to drink to exceſs, that the beaſtlineſs of the vice might appear. When they retired from the public meal, they were not allowed any torches or lights, becauſe it was expected, that men, who were perfectly ſober, ſhould be able to find their way in the dark; and beſides it gave them a facility of marching without light, a thing wonderfully uſeful to them in time of war.

THE laws relating to their habit fall under the ſixth table. As the poor eat as well as the rich, ſo the rich could wear nothing better than the poor; they neither changed their faſhion, nor the materials, of their garments; they were made for warmth and ſtrength, not for gallantry and ſhew; and to this cuſtom even their kings conformed, who wore nothing gaudy in right of their dignity, but were contented that their virtue ſhould diſtinguiſh them rather than robes. The young lads wore a tunic till they were twelve years old; afterwards they had a cloke given them, which was to ſerve them a year; and their cloathing was in general ſo thin, that a Lacedæmonian veſt became proverbial. Boys were always uſed to go without ſhoes, but when they grew up they were indulgent to them, if the manner of life they led required it; but they were always inured to run without them, as alſo to climb up and ſlip down ſteep places with bare feet, nay the very ſhoes they uſed was of a particular form, plain and ſtrong, and from the place of its invention Laconic. Boys were not permitted to wear their hair, but when they grew up they did not cut it. Baths and anointing were not much in uſe among the Lacedæmonians; the river Eurotas ſupplied the former, and exerciſe the latter. In the field, however, their ſumptuary laws did not take place ſo ſtrictly as in the city; for when they went to war they wore purple habits; they put on crowns when they were about to engage the enemy; they had alſo rings, but they were of iron, which metal was moſt eſteemed by this nation. Young women wore their veſts or jerkins only to their knees, or, as ſome think, not quite ſo low, which beyond queſtion was indecent, and as ſuch it is cenſured both by Greek and Roman authors. Gold, precious ſtones, and other coſtly ornaments, were permitted only to common women; which permiſſion was the ſtrongeſt prohibition to women of virtue, or who affected to be thought virtuous. Virgins went abroad without vails, with which married women, on the contrary, were always covered, it being conceived fit for the one to be looked on, but not the other; in certain exerciſes and ſhews both the young women and men were naked, a thing for which Plutarch endeavours to apologize, as if there could be no nakedneſs where the mind was in the habit of virtue; this is evidently playing with words, for without queſtion there never was a more immoral impudent practice than this; the truth is, Lycurgus had nothing in view but the rendering the common-wealth of Sparta powerful and laſting; and that he might do this, he ſought by all means to eradicate the ſeeds of civil diſſentions; hence the equal diviſion of eſtates; hence the baniſhment of wealth; and hence the accuſtoming men to bear with the wantonneſs of women; that birth, riches, jealouſy, which, in other countries and in other ſtates, produced ſuch ſtirs and tumults, might be able to effect little or nothing in Lacedæmon.

DISCIPLINE and manners, that is the rules regarding theſe, ſhall fall under the ſeventh table. Though the Spartans were always free, yet it was with this reſtriction, that they were ſubſervient to their own laws, which bound them as ſtrictly in the city, as ſoldiers in other ſtates were bound by the rules of war in the camp. In the firſt place, ſtrict obedience to their ſuperiors was the great thing required in Sparta; this they looked upon as the very baſis of government, without which neither laws nor magiſtrates availed much. Old age was an indubitable title to honour in Sparta; to the old men the youth roſe up whenever they came into any public place; they gave way to them when they

they met them in the ſtreets, and were ſilent whenever their elders ſpoke. As all children were looked upon as the children of the ſtate, ſo all the old men had the authority of parents, they reprehended whatever they ſaw amiſs, not only in their own, but in other people's children, and by this method Lycurgus provided, that as youth are everywhere apt to offend, ſo they might be no-where without a monitor. The laws went ſtill further; if an old man was preſent where a young one committed a fault and did not reprove him, he was puniſhed equally with the delinquent. Amongſt the youths there was one of their own body, or at moſt two years older than the reſt, who was ſtiled Iren; he had authority to queſtion all their actions, to look ſtrictly to their behaviour, and to puniſh them if they did amiſs; neither were their puniſhments light, but on the contrary very ſevere, whereby the boys were made hardy, and accuſtomed to bear ſtripes and hard uſage. Silence was a thing highly commended and greatly valued at Sparta, where modeſty was held to be a moſt becoming virtue in young people; nor was it reſtrained only to their words and actions, but to their very looks and geſtures, Lycurgus having particularly directed that they ſhould look forward, or on the ground, and that they ſhould always keep their hands within their robes. A ſtupid inconſiderate perſon, one who would not liſten to inſtruction, but was careleſs of whatever the world might ſay of him, the Lacedæmonians treated as a ſcandal to human nature; with ſuch an one they would not converſe, but threw him off as a rotten branch and worthleſs member of ſociety.

THE ſtudies and learning of this people fall naturally into the eighth table. The plainneſs of their manners, and their being ſo very much addicted to war, made the Lacedæmonians leſs fond of the ſciences than the reſt of the Greeks; they meaſured the worth of all things by their uſefulneſs, and therefore, if they wrote to be read, and ſpoke to be underſtood, it was all they ſought. For this the Athenians, who were exceſſively vain of their learning, mightily condemned them, inſomuch, that Thucydides himſelf, in drawing the character of Braſidas, ſays, he ſpoke well enough for a Lacedæmonian. Theſe, on the other hand, valued themſelves no leſs on their roughneſs and their ſteady adherence to the maxims of their anceſtors, as, amongſt other inſtances, appears from this anſwer of a Spartan to one of the learned Athenians, who upbraided him with the ignorance of his country: All you ſay may be true, and yet it amounts to no more, than that we only amongſt the Greeks have learned no evil cuſtoms from you. Arts were in no greater credit with them than ſciences; a ſoldier was the only reputable profeſſion in Sparta, a mechanic or a huſbandman was thought a low fellow; the reaſon of this was, that they imagined profeſſions which required much labour, ſome conſtant poſture, being continually in the houſe, or always about a fire, weakened the body, and depreſſed the mind; whereas a man free from theſe incumbrances was at liberty to attend the ſervice of the republic in time of peace, and to fight its battles when engaged in war. Such profeſſions as were neceſſary the Helotes exerciſed, but for curious arts, and ſuch as ſerved only to luxury, they would not ſo much as ſuffer them to be practiſed in their city, in conſequence of which rhetoricians, fortune-tellers, bankers, and dealers in money were ſhut out; neither tragedy nor comedy could obtrude itſelf on the Spartans, they would not bear the repreſentation of evil even to produce good; but other kinds of poetry were admitted, provided the magiſtrates had the peruſal of pieces before they were handed to the public. Above all things they affected brevity of ſpeech, and accuſtomed their children from their very infancy never to expreſs themſelves in more words than were ſtrictly neceſſary, whence a conciſe and ſententious oratory is to this day ſtiled Laconic. In writing they uſed the ſame method, of which we have a ſignal inſtance in a letter of Archidamus to the Eleans, when he underſtood that they had ſome thoughts of aſſiſting the Arcadians; it ran thus: Archidamus to the Eleans. It is good to be quiet. And therefore Epaminondas had reaſon to glory in having forced the Spartans to abandon their monoſyllables and to lengthen their diſcourſes. We need not wonder, that people, ſo much removed from their neighbours in their cuſtoms and manners, ſhould not be deſirous of having the cuſtoms and laws of ſtrangers publiſhed or diſcourſed of in their city; this therefore was a law given by Lycurgus, and ſtrictly adhered to; but ſome, who have inferred from thence, that the Lacedæmonians were equally cautious to prevent ſtrangers from gaining acquaintance with their laws and cuſtoms, are ſomewhat miſtaken; for in this point they were not ſo ſtrict. The greateſt part of their education conſiſted in giving their youth right ideas of men and things; the Iren or maſter propoſed queſtions, and either commended the anſwers that were made him, or reproved

ſuch as anſwered childiſhly; theſe queſtions did not relate either to trivial or to abſtruſe matters, but to points of the higheſt importance in civil life; ſuch as, Who was the beſt man in the city? wherein lay the merit of ſuch an action? and whether this or that hero's fame was well founded? Harmleſs raillery was greatly encouraged, and this, joined to their ſhort manner of ſpeaking, rendered Laconic replies univerſally admired. Muſic was much encouraged, but in this, as in other things, they adhered to that which had been in favour with their anceſtors; nay, they were ſo ſtrict therein, that they would not permit their ſlaves to learn either the tune or the words of their moſt admired odes, or, which is all one, they would not permit them to ſing them if they had learned them. The love of boys was much encouraged at Sparta, but it was a virtuous and modeſt affection, untinged with that ſenſuality which was ſo ſcandalous at Athens; female friendſhips were no leſs frequent, and no leſs warm; it is likely, that Lycurgus introduced theſe things in order the better to unite his citizens, which is the more probable, if we conſider, that neither in one caſe, nor in the other, rivals were angry, or bore ill-will towards each other; but on the contrary, their love to the ſame perſon begat a ſecundary friendſhip among themſelves, and united them in all things which might be for the benefit of the perſon beloved. There is but one thing more, in reſpect to their education, which deſerves mention, and it is this; That theft, if it was handſomely concealed, was not held ſcandalous amongſt them; a moſt abſurd inſtitution, for which many apologies have been offered, which have done as little honour to their authors, as this very law did to Lycurgus. When theft was diſcovered, however, it was ſeverely puniſhed, and what between this practice and the former the Spartan youth were ſo hardened, that they would endure any thing, after they had committed a theft, rather than ſuffer it to be known. It would be eaſy to alledge inſtances, but to what end? to prove, that in defence of vice men will dare to ſuffer pain? We ſee it every day, and therefore they are needleſs; it was an error in the Lacedæmonian policy, which we are not bound either to palliate or excuſe.

The exerciſes inſtituted by law fall under the ninth table; in theſe all the Greeks were extremely careful, but the Lacedæmonians in a degree beyond the reſt; for if a youth by his corpulence, or any other means, became unfit for theſe exerciſes, he fell into public contempt at leaſt, if not baniſhment. Hunting was the uſual diverſion of their children, nay, it was made a part of their education, becauſe it had a tendency to ſtrengthen the limbs, and to render thoſe that practiſed it ſupple and fleet; they likewiſe bred up dogs for hunting with great care. They had a kind of public dances, in which they exceedingly delighted, and which were common alike to virgins and young men; indeed in all their ſports girls were allowed to divert themſelves with the youths, inſomuch, that at darting, throwing the choit, pitching the bar, and ſuch-like robuſt diverſions, the women were as dextrous as the men; for the manifeſt oddity of this proceeding Lycurgus aſſigned no other reaſon, than that he ſought to render women as well as men ſtrong and healthy, that the children they brought forth might be ſo too; violent exerciſes and a laborious kind of life were only injoined to the youth; for when they were grown up to mens eſtate, that is, were upwards of thirty years old, they were exempted from all kinds of labour, and employed themſelves wholly either in affairs of ſtate or in war. They had a method of whipping at a certain time young lads in the temple of Diana, and about her altar, which, however palliated, was certainly unnatural and cruel. It was eſteemed a great honour for lads to ſuſtain theſe flagellations without weeping, groaning, or ſhewing any ſenſe of pain; and the thirſt of glory was ſo ſtrong in theſe young minds, that they very frequently ſuffered death without ſhedding a tear, or breathing a ſigh. A deſire of overcoming all the weakneſſes of human nature, and thereby rendering his Spartans not only ſuperior to their neighbours, but to their ſpecies, runs through many of the inſtitutions of Lycurgus; which principle, if well attended to, thoroughly explains them, and without attending to which it is impoſſible to give any account of them at all.

The tenth table ſhall comprehend their laws reſpecting contracts and money-matters. Gold and ſilver were by the conſtitutions of Lycurgus made of no value in Sparta; he was ſo well apprized of the danger of riches, that he made the very poſſeſſion of them penal; but as there was no living without ſome ſort of money, that is, ſome common meaſure or ſtandard of the worth of things, he directed an iron coinage, whereby the Spartans were ſupplied with the uſeful money, and had at the ſame time no temptation to covetouſneſs afforded them; for a very ſmall ſum was ſufficient to load a couple of horſes, and a great one muſt have been kept in a barn or warehouſe; the coming in of all foreign money was alſo prohibited, that corruption might not enter under the name of commerce. The moſt antient method of dealing, viz. by barter or exchange of one commodity for another, was preſerved by law in Sparta long after it had been out of date every-where elſe. Intereſt was a thing forbid in the Spartan common-wealth, where they had alſo a law againſt the alienation of lands, and accepting preſents from foreigners even without the limits of their own country, and when their authority and character might well ſeem to excuſe them; thus by all poſſible methods Lycurgus ſought to ſhut out corruption, to oblige his citizens to live ſimply and innocently, without admitting amongſt them thoſe ſeeds of luxury and diſſenſion, which he ſaw had produced ſuch fatal effects in the regions through which he travelled.

no

SUCH of the laws of Sparta as related to courts of juſtice may be brought under the eleventh table. Thirty years muſt have paſſed over the head of him who had a right to concern himſelf in juridical proceedings; young men were thought unfit for them, and it was even held indecent, and of ill report, for a man to have any fondneſs for law-ſuits, or to be buſying himſelf at the tribunals, when he had no affairs there of his own; by theſe rules Lycurgus thought to ſhut out litigiouſneſs, and to prevent that multiplicity of ſuits which is always ſcandalous in a ſtate. As young people were not permitted to enquire about the laws of other countries, and as they were hindered from hearing judicial proceedings in their courts, ſo they were forbidden likewiſe to aſk any queſtions about, or to endeavour to diſcover the reaſons of, the laws by which themſelves were governed. Obedience was their duty, and to that alone they would have them kept. Men of abandoned characters, or who were notoriouſly of ill fame, loſt all right of giving their votes in reſpect of public affairs, or of ſpeaking in public aſſemblies; for they would not believe that an ill man in private life could mean his country better than he did his neighbour.

THE military laws of Sparta ſhall compoſe the twelfth table. Till a man was thirty years old, he was not capable of ſerving in the army, as the beſt authors agree, tho' tho' ſome think, that the military age is not well aſcertained by antient authors; they were forbidden to march at any time before the full moon, the reaſon of which law is very hard to be diſcovered, if indeed it had any reaſon at all, or was not rather founded in ſome ſuperſtitious opinion, that this was a more lucky conjuncture than any other. They were likewiſe forbidden to fight often againſt the ſame enemy, which was one of the wiſeſt maxims in the political ſyſtem of Lycurgus; and we ſhall ſee, that Ageſilaus, by offending againſt it, deſtroyed the power of his country, and loſt her that authority which for many ages ſhe maintained over the reſt of Greece; for by continually warring againſt the Thebans, to whom he had an inveterate hatred, he at laſt beat them into the knowledge of the art of war, and enabled them under the command of Epaminondas to maintain for a time the principality of Greece. Maritime affairs they were forbid to meddle with, though the neceſſity of things compelled them in proceſs of time to tranſgreſs this inſtitution, and by degrees they transferred to themſelves as well the dominion at ſea as land, as the reader hath already ſeen in the Athenian hiſtory; but after the Peloponneſian war they again neglected naval affairs, from a perſuaſion that ſailors and ſtrangers corrupted thoſe with whom they converſed. As they never fortified Sparta, ſo they were not ready to undertake ſieges; fighting in the field was their proper province, and while they could overcome their enemies there, they rightly conceived that nothing could hurt them at home. In time of war they relaxed ſomewhat of their ſtrict manner of living, in which they were ſingular; the true reaſon for this was, in all probabilty, that war might be leſs burdenſome to them; for, as we have more than once obſerved, a ſtrong deſire to render them bold and warlike was the reigning paſſion of their legiſlator. For they were forbidden to remain long encamped in the ſame place, as well to hinder their being ſurpriſed, as that they might be more troubleſome to their enemies, by waſting every corner of their country. They ſlept all night in their armour, but their out-guards were not allowed their ſhields, that being unprovided of defence they might not dare to ſleep. In all their expeditions, they were careful in the performance of religious rites, and after their evening meal was over, the ſoldiers ſung together hymns to their gods. When they were about to engage, the king ſacrificed to the muſes, that by their aſſiſtance they might be enabled to perform deeds worthy of being recorded to lateſt times; then the army advanced in order to the ſound of flutes, which played the hymn of Caſtor; the king himſelf ſung the pæan, which was the ſignal to charge; this was done with all the decorum imaginable, and the ſoldiers were ſure either to die or conquer; indeed they had nothing elſe to do, for if they fled they were infamous, and in danger of being ſlain, even by their own mothers, for diſgracing their families. Hiſtory informs us, that a Spartan lady, on the news of her ſon's having fled from a battle, wrote him this ſhort letter, Fame ſpeaks ill of you, efface it, or be no more. In this conſiſted all the excellency of the Spartan women, who, if it were poſſible, excelled in bravery their men, never lamenting over huſbands or ſons, if they died honourably in the field, but deploring the ſhame brought on their houſe, if either the one or the other eſcaped by flight. The throwing away of a ſhield alſo induced infamy, and with reſpect to this, mothers, when they embraced their departing ſons, were wont to caution them, that they ſhould either return armed as they were, or be brought back ſo, that is, when they were dead; for, as we have before obſerved, ſuch as were ſlain in battle were nevertheleſs buried in their own country. When they had made their enemies fly, they purſued no longer than till the victory was out of doubt, becauſe they would ſeem to fight rather for the honour of victory, than that they might put their enemies to death. According to their antient rules of war, they were bound not to ſpoil the dead bodies of their enemies, but in proceſs of time this, and indeed many other of their moſt excellent regulations, fell into diſſuetude. He who overcame by ſtratagem offered up an ox to Mars, whereas he who overcame by force offered up only a cock, the former being eſteemed more manly than the latter. After forty years ſervice a man was diſcharged, that is, it was no longer required of him by law to go into the field, and conſequently, that if the military age was thirty, the Spartans were not held invalids, till they were ſeventy. Thus we have comprized the moſt conſiderable of the Spartan laws into twelve tables. Some indeed we have omitted, becauſe we ſhall be obliged to ſpeak of their being enacted elſewhere [b].

to

LYCUR-

[b] Plut. in vit. Lycurg. & in Inſtit. Lacon. Ariſt. Polit. Plat. de Legib. & de Repub. Xenoph. Inſt. Lac. Ælian. var. Hiſt. Herac. Pont. in Fragm.

The Cryptia what, and how publiſhed.

LYCURGUS did not put any of his laws into writing, becauſe he would have them written in the hearts of the people, and to impreſs them the more ſtrongly there, he took great pains to make it be believed, that they were given to him by Apollo, wherefore he ſtilled them Rhetræ, i. e. divine ſanctions. It is not clear, whether or not Lycurgus was the author of that political contrivance, which prevailed amongſt his countrymen, for leſſening the number of their ſlaves whenever they grew dangerous to the ſtate, and which was ſtiled Cryptia, i. e. the ambuſcade. Such as had the care of educating the Spartan youth picked out the ſtouteſt of them, and, having armed them with daggers, ſent them out to deſtroy their unhappy ſlaves, which they did, either by ſurpriſing them in the night, or falling upon them in the day, when they were at their work, without any crime being pretended againſt them, and for no other reaſon than that the ſtate might be ſafe from their attempts by this reduction of their number. Plato greatly condemns this law, for which reaſon Plutarch denies that it was made by Lycurgus; but when, or however, it was made, it was indubitably againſt natural equity, or, to ſpeak with greater propriety, againſt humanity; a cruel and unneceſſary expedient, and unworthy of a virtuous people [c] (A).

IT

[c] Plut. in vit. Lycurg. Plato de Legib. l. i. p. 633.

(A) The cruelty of the Lacedæmonians towards their ſlaves, or Helotes, is frequently ſpoken of, and generally decried by all authors, though Plutarch, who was a great admirer of the Spartans, endeavours every where to palliate it as much as may be. To give the reader a diſtinct account of this matter, we muſt firſt acquaint him who theſe Helotes are: Helos was an antient city in Laconia, againſt which on ſome pretence or other the Lacedæmonians made war, and having ſubdued it, they made all the inhabitants thereof, and of the adjacent diſtrict, ſlaves (1). And in proceſs of time, when they had enlarged the number of perſons in this unhappy condition by ſubjugating other places, they ſtill kept up the old name, and called them all Helotes, which, ceaſing then to be a proper name, became common to all who were in this ſtate of ſervitude. As to the terms of it, they were theſe: Firſt, their lords could not ſet them free; and ſecondly they had no power to ſell

(1) Homer. Iliad. B. v. 585. Strabo Geogr. lib. viii. p. 363. Pauſan. Lacon. 201.

IT is not to be conceived, that ſuch mighty changes could be wrought in a country without any oppoſition, neither indeed

Sedition in Sparta. Lycurgus wounded in the eye.

ſell them, ſo as that they might be tranſported out of the Lacedæmonian dominions (2). Hence it came to paſs that they were prodigiouſly numerous, which ſometimes alarmed the Spartans, and made them deviſe the law above recited to keep them under. Ariſtotle expreſly affirms, that it was deviſed by Lycurgus (3). Plutarch would gladly have this diſbelieved, merely becauſe he thinks it injurious to that legiſlator; for he offers no reaſon for it whatſoever, and at the ſame time owns, that Plato himſelf had been diſpleaſed with Lycurgus for the cruelty and injuſtice of this law (4). Plutarch elſewhere informs us, that the Helotes were employed to cultivate the lands of their lords, that they did not give an exact account of their produce, but paid a ſmall ſettled rent, which their lords could not raiſe without incurring public cenſure (5). This is Plutarch's account of the matter, from whence one would be led to conceive, that theſe Helotes were a kind of bailiffs, ſtewards, or lower ſort of farmers. But other authors ſpeak quite a different language, they tell us, that liberty and ſlavery were in their extremes at Sparta, that none were ſo perfectly free as the citizens of Lacedæmon, nor any ſuch deſpicable ſlaves as theſe Helotes; they were diſtinguiſhed, that is, marked out for ſlaves in their dreſs, their geſture, and in ſhort in every thing; they wore dog-ſkin bonnets, ſheep-ſkin veſts; they were forbidden to learn any liberal art, or to perform any act worthy of their maſters; when their lords were ſo diſpoſed, theſe poor men were obliged to drink themſelves drunk, that the free-born Spartans might ſee the beaſtlineſs of that vice in their behaviour. Once a day they received a certain number of ſtripes, for fear they ſhould forget they were ſlaves; and to crown all they were liable to this Cryptia, which was ſure to be executed on all ſuch as ſpoke, looked, or walked like freemen (6). To take off ſomewhat of the horror and ſcandal of ſuch a practice, the ephori, after they were inſtituted, at their coming into office declared war againſt them (7); againſt whom? why againſt poor naked ſlaves, who tilled their lands, dreſſed their food, and did all thoſe offices for them which they were too proud to do for themſelves. Plutarch, according to cuſtom, endeavours to place all this cruelty far lower than the times of Lycurgus, and alledges, that it was introduced on account of the Helotes joining with the Meſſenians after a great indeed were they ; for when he proceeded to the diviſion of property, a great ſedition aroſe, wherein at laſt the people proceeded to blows, and Lycurgus found himſelf obliged to quit the aſſembly in order to fly to a ſanctuary ; ſome of them, however, cloſely purſued him, and amongſt the reſt one Alcander, a young nobleman of a generous, but too haſty, diſpoſition, who, on Lycurgus's looking back, ſtruck him on the eye, and, as ſome ſay, beat it out ; the legiſlator then ſtopped, and ſhewing his face all covered with blood, the people were ſo ſtruck thereat, that they immediately aſked his pardon, and delivered up Alcander into his hands to be treated as he thought fit. Lycurgus accepted the propoſal, and carried Alcander home with him, where, inſtead of puniſhing, or even reproving him harſhly, he received him as his attendant, cauſed him to wait on him at meals, and kept him always near his perſon ; this mildneſs was of great ſervice to them both, for Alcander perceiving that Lycurgus was not, as he had ſuppoſed him, a man of a harſh and moroſe diſpoſition, but of a moſt ſweet and affable temper, he became from his fierceſt enemy his greateſt admirer, which wrought mightily on the minds of the people, and engaged them to receive as oracles the inſtructions of Lycurgus. Another good it wrought was this, that it became immediately a law, from which they never receded, that no weapon whatſoever, no not ſo much as a ſtaff, was brought into their aſſemblies or public councils [d].

(2) Strabo, lib. viii. Pollux. lib. 3. c. 8. (3) Polit. lib. ii. (4) In vit. Lycurg. (5) Inſtit. Lacedæm. (6) Miron. Prien. ap. Athen. Deipnoſ. lib. xiv. (7) Ariſt. Polit. lib. ii.

[d] Plut. ubi ſupra.

WHEN

great earthquake, whereby a great part of Lacedæmon was overthrown (8 ; but Ælian tells us expreſly, that it was the common opinion in Greece, that this very earthquake was a judgment from heaven upon the Spartans for treating theſe Helotes with ſuch inhumanity (9). Thucydides gives a glaring inſtance of the jealouſy of the Lacedæmonians on account of theſe poor men ; he ſays, that about two thouſand of them, being manumitted by law for their great ſervice in the Peloponneſian war, were crowned with garlands, led about to the temples, and entertained with ſhews ; after all which they diſappeared on a ſudden, nor could any body ever tell what became of them (10).

(8) Plut. in vit. Lycurg. (9) Hiſt. Var. lib. iii. (10) Thucyd. de Bell. Pelop. lib. iv. vide etiam Ubb. Emm. de Repub. Lac. Crag. de Repub. Lac. lib. i. c. 11. Meurſ. Miſc. Lacon. lib. ii. c. 6.

When Lycurgus had fully perfected his deſign, and wrought the commonwealth into that form, which, from the conſideration of the nature of men and of the different effects of various governments upon them, he thought moſt eligible; his next care was to render this fixed and ſtable, and to prevent his countrymen from overturning that ſtructure which he had raiſed, and running back into the condition wherein he found them. After ſome time he fell upon a method of effecting it, which was this: He called a general aſſembly, wherein he declared, that he now thought every thing was brought into its proper order, and that there remained behind but one point to be ſettled, which was indeed of the higheſt importance, and what he could not acquaint them with till he had conſulted the oracle at Delphi; to which place he was ready to go, provided they would engage themſelves to obſerve his rhetræ inviolably till his return. To this all ranks and degrees of people readily aſſented, and to bind their aſſent, Lycurgus took an oath upon the ſpot from the two kings, the ſenate, and the commons; after which he departed, as he had propoſed, and went to Delphi. There he propoſed this queſtion to the oracle; ſhall the laws eſtabliſhed in Sparta make that city virtuous and happy? The reſponſe was, The laws given to Sparta are excellent, and the city ſhall continue in the higheſt renown, while it obſerves the polity of Lycurgus. This he took in writing and ſent to Sparta, after which he ſacrificed a ſecond time to Apollo, and having ſolemnly taken leave of his friends and of his ſon, he determined with himſelf to put an end to his life by faſting, that the Lacedæmonians might never have it in their power to free themſelves from the oath which he had taken from them. Plutarch expreſſes himſelf in very high terms in reſpect to the death of Lycurgus, he commends it as one of the nobleſt inſtances of patriotiſm, which is to be met with in antient hiſtory; becauſe, ſays he, the legiſlator ſecured a double point by this manner of dying; he put a moſt honourable end to a virtuous and well-ſpent life, and he affixed his death as a ſeal to his laws, which he left as his laſt will and teſtament to his country. He tells us likewiſe, that his bones were carried home to Sparta, and buried under a plain tomb, which, as a mark of the divine favour, he ſays, was afterwards blaſted with lightning, an accident peculiar to Lycurgus and Euripides the poet. The Spartans, to do honour to his memory, erected a temple to him, and ſacrificed annually thereat. But after all this pompous account, Method taken by this legiſlator to ſettle his laws.

Plutarch

Plutarch himſelf acknowledges, that authors are not well agreed, how, or where, this great man died; ſome ſay, he ended his days at Cirrha, Apolothemis affirmed, that he died at Elis, Timœus and Ariſtoxenus agree, that he finiſhed his days in Crete, and the latter ſays the inhabitants ſhewed his tomb. Ariſtocrates the ſon of Hipparchus wrote likewiſe that he died in Crete, but he added, that by the direction of Lycurgus the perſons with whom he lodged burnt his body, and ſcattered the aſhes thereof in the air, and on the ſea, that they might never be tranſported to Lacedæmon, to prevent the people apprehending themſelves releaſed from their oath. He left behind him one ſon, whoſe name was Antiorus, who dying without iſſue, his race became extinct. His relations and friends held an annual aſſembly in commemoration of the deceaſed, and that they might therein diſcourſe, and exhort each other to the imitation of his virtues; the days of this meeting were in honour of the legiſlator ſtiled Lycurgides [c] (B).

From

[c] Plut. in vit. Lycurg.

(B) The life of Lycurgus was the firſt which Plutarch publiſhed, as he himſelf obſerves (11). He ſeems to have had a mighty liking to the Spartans and their cuſtoms; for, beſides this life and thoſe of ſeveral other Spartan chieftains, we have a treatiſe of his on the laws and cuſtoms of the Lacedæmonians, and another of Laconic apophthegms; he owns notwithſtanding, that with reſpect to the family and the time of the birth of this legiſlator, there is great uncertainty. He makes him, however, in all things a perfect hero, and alledges his behaviour as a proof that the wiſe man ſo often deſcribed, and ſo much commended by philoſophers, was not a mere ideal character unattainable by human nature. He is very particular as to the ſalutation of the prophetеſs at Delphi, which, he ſays, run in theſe words: Welcome, beloved of God, and rather God than man (12). This oracle was certainly very famous in Greece, and generally ſpeaking believed, otherwiſe Socrates would not have quoted it in his defence (13), or Plutarch have ſo often urged it as a full anſwer to all the calumnies raiſed againſt his hero. Yet ſomething may be ſaid, not greatly to the reputation either of the oracle or Lycurgus, viz. that this was all contrivance, in order to bring about what could otherwiſe never have been brought about, the impoſing his harſh laws upon the Spartans. It is very likely, that he took this hint from the conduct of Minos the Cretan lawgiver, (11) In vit. Theſei. (12) Plut. in vit. Lycurg. (13) Xenoph. de Reb. Memor.

FROM the death of Lycurgus the Lacedæmonian hiſtory is for a long time very perplexed, there being no other materials from whence it may be collected, than ſcattered paſſages of antient authors, which, as well as we are able, we ſhall put together. Charilaus made war on the Argives, but with little ſucceſs; afterwards he fell on the Tegeatæ a people of Arcadia; but in this war alſo he had very bad fortune, The reigns of Charilaus and Teleclus. Year after the Flood, 2095. Before Chriſt, 904.

giver, who aſcribed all his laws to Jupiter; but from whomſoever he took it, an antient author of great note affirms, that the reſponſes of the oracle were framed by his wit, and procured by his money (14). The reader has ſeen in the Athenian hiſtory many inſtances of a like nature, and we ſhall hereafter ſhew, that Lyſander knew how to make Apollo ſpeak kindly in his favour, as well as Lycurgus. It is clear, that our law-giver depended chiefly on the people's apprehending his inſtitutions to be divine; for this cauſe he would never ſuffer his laws to be put into writing, but truſted them to the memory, that they might at once make the greater impreſſion, and give the government greater power. Plutarch affords us an inſtance of this; he ſays, that by a Rhetra of Lycurgus the people had power to aſſent or diſſent from what was propoſed to them by the kings and ſenate; but when by degrees they extended this power, and began to gloſs upon the laws, to aſſent to one part of them and to diſſent from another, the kings and ſenate, that they might be even with them in their own way, added a new clauſe to the Rhetra to this purpoſe, that if the people ſhould offer any croſs propoſal, then the ſenate and kings might reject it. Which clauſe, by dint of a little of their legiſlator's art, they impoſed as a genuine injunction, and thereby ſtrengthened their own authority at the expence of the people's (15). Moſt politicians have held Lycurgus's invention of a ſenate to have been a moſt excellent contrivance: Plato was ſo much charmed with it, that from thence he ſtiles its author a divine ſpirit reſiding in a human nature (16): yet Ariſtotle, who was an excellent politician, found great fault with that inſtitution; he thought it unreaſonable, that ſenators ſhould be made for life, becauſe frequently mens abilities decay, ſo that inſtead of being able to mind public affairs, they become unfit to tranſact thoſe of their own family. He was likewiſe offended, that they were left without controul, for he thought, that as all men were liable to errors, ſo all men ought to be accountable for them, eſpecially if their errors might any way affect the ſtate (17). The laſt act of Lycurgus, of fortune, for he was taken priſoner in a battle, which was won chiefly by the volour of the women ; and to purchaſe his liberty, he was conſtrained to take a ſolemn oath, that he would never make war on this people any more, which oath, however, he kept very indifferently [f]. He then turned his arms againſt the Achæans, who had taken from the Lacedæmonians ſeveral frontier towns, which he and his collegue Teleclus recovered. Among theſe were Amyclas, Pharis, and Geronthra ; the firſt they raſed, the inhabitants of the other two cities by agreement were permitted to retire out of Peloponneſus ; ſuch were the military exploits of Charilaus or Charillus ; he retained always a great reſpect for his tutor Lycurgus, as appears from ſeveral of his ſayings which have reached our times : for being once aſked, why Lycurgus had made ſo few laws, he anſwered, Men of few words need but few laws ; and it being demanded of him what kind of polity he held to be the moſt compleie, That, ſays he, wherein moſt of the citizens contend in virtue without diſturbing each other [g]. His collegue of the other regal houſe was Teleclus, a prince of indifferent parts and fortune. Being told before he ſucceeded to the crown, by ſome who ſought to flatter him, that his father had ſpoke ſlightingly of him, he anſwered, That he was ſorry for it, becauſe he would not have done it, if himſelf had of which we have any certainty, is his ſending the oracle from Delphi to Sparta, ſignifying the approbation given by Apollo to all his laws ; that he ſtarved himſelf there is improbable, but that he returned no more to his country ſeems to be perfectly agreeable to his manner of acting ; for he was extremely ambitious of being thought ſomewhat more than man, as appears from the whole tenour of his behaviour, and his life could never have been cloſed by any act more ſhining than this of quitting ſupreme power, when his countrymen unanimouſly deſired that he ſhould retain it. This ſhewed, that he was truly diſintereſted, and did not ſeek any other reward for the ſervices he rendered Sparta, than the glory of having ſerved her. Solon, though a perſon of a different temper, was as diſintereſted as he ; he ſettled the Athenian commonwealth, refuſed the ſovereignty when offered to him, travelled to avoid the importunities of his countrymen, oppoſed tyranny in his old age, and when he found his oppoſition vain went into voluntary exile. Lycurgus and Solon were both great men, but the former had the ſtronger, the latter the milder, genius, the effects of which appeared in the commonwealths they founded.

(14) Polyæn. Strateg. lib. i. c. 16. (15) Plutarch. in vit. Lycurg. (16) Plato de Legib. lib. iii. (17) Ariſt. lib. ii. & lib. vi.

[f] Pauſan. in Arcad. [g] Plut. in Apophtheg. Lacon.

had not deſerved it [h]. His death gave occaſion to the Meſſenian war, but after what manner cannot eaſily be determined. There was, it ſeems, a temple of Diana ſeated on the marches between Laconia and Meſſenia, to which the inhabitants of both regions reſorted; ſome Spartan virgins repairing thither were violated by the Meſſenians, and Teleclus, endeavouring to prevent this outrage, was ſlain; the women alſo famiſhed themſelves to death. This is the Spartan ſide of the ſtory; the Meſſenians reported it thus: That Teleclus, intending to ſurprize ſome of the principal perſons of their country, came thither with certain of his friends in female habits, with poignards under their cloaths, and that, a fray happening, Teleclus and ſome of his aſſociates were ſlain. But there wanted not other cauſes of ill-will among theſe people, for the Spartans entertained an opinion, that their kings Euryſthenes and Procles were cheated by their uncle Creſphontes in the aſſignment of their territories, the moſt barren being given to them, and the beſt reſerved to himſelf. While things were in this ſituation, an injury done to a private perſon kindled up the fire of war. Thus it happened; Polychares a Meſſenian entruſted Euephnus a Lacedæmonian with ſome cows, on condition that he ſhould have a moiety of the profit ariſing from their milk. The Spartan ſold theſe cows to certain chapmen, and not only the cows, but the herdſmen who kept them, his merchants agreeing to take them away by force; as ſoon as this was done, Euephnus went to Polychares, and told him a melancholy ſtory of certain robbers who had ſtolen the cattle and their keepers. But, unluckily for him, while he was in the midſt of his tale, came one or two of his herdſmen, who had made their eſcape, and falſified all he ſaid; upon this the Lacedæmonian confeſſed the truth, and told Polychares, that if he would ſend his ſon home with him, he would give him a moiety of the money, to which the Meſſenian readily agreed. But when they were come to Sparta, Euephnus moſt perfidiouſly murdered the lad, and Polychares, coming ſeveral times to Sparta to demand juſtice, was forced to retire unredreſſed and unheeded. He, being exceedingly provoked with ſuch barbarous uſage, reſolved to take vengeance of the whole nation, and in conſequence of this reſolution, killed as many of the Lacedæmonians as he could meet with, which on the other hand was highly reſented by that people [i].

[h] Plut. ubi ſupra. [i] Pauſan. in Meſſen. Strab. lib. vii, viii, Juſtin. lib. iii. c. 5.

Theſe tranſactions we have thrown together, though they happened at ſome diſtance of time, becauſe we were willing to place all the cauſes or ſuppoſed cauſes of the Meſſenian war in the reader's view at once; we will, however, interrupt this narration a little, that we may preſerve in its juſt order the ſucceſſion of the Spartan kings.

The reigns of Nicander and Alcamenes.

To Charilaus ſucceeded his ſon Nicander, who reigned thirty-nine years, and in the thirty-fourth year of whoſe reign was celebrated the firſt olympiad; he is ſaid to have carried on the war with the Argives, and to have done them a great deal of miſchief; but for the other great actions of his life, if there were any, they were not recorded. Teleclus had for his ſucceſſor his ſon Alcamenes, who, with his collegue before-mentioned, ſent to the Meſſenians to demand juſtice againſt Polychares, and that he ſhould be delivered up; the Meſſenians were at that time governed by Androcles and Antiochus, brothers; the former was much againſt yielding on any terms to the requeſt of the Lacedæmonians, alledging, that they were the aggreſſors, and therefore ought to do juſtice firſt; the latter was againſt hazarding the public ſafety on account of a private perſon, and therefore declared that he would give up Polychares rather than break with the Spartans; the diſputes on this occaſion roſe ſo high, that from words they came to blows, wherein Androcles was ſlain. Antiochus, now reigning alone, ſent immediately embaſſadors to Sparta, beſeeching the king and ſenate to conſider, that they were originally of the ſame ſtock, and that therefore they ought not to be ready on every turn to make war on each other, offering in the preſent caſe to leave the deciſion of this matter either to the Argives, who were their common allies, to the Amphictyonian council, or to the ſenate of Areopagus at Athens. The Spartans gave no anſwer to theſe deputies, and while things were in this ſituation, Antiochus died, and was ſucceeded in his dominions by his ſon Euphaes; to him the Lacedæmonians made no complaint, neither did they renounce their correſpondence with the Meſſenians, yet were they all this time providing ſecretly for the war, and, when all things were ready, engaged in it without giving the leaſt notice. Before they proceeded to hoſtilities, the kings and ſenate called a general aſſembly, in which the troops appointed for the war took a ſolemn oath never to return home till they had entirely conquered Meſſenia, which ſhewed, that this was a war of ambition rather ther than juſtice, and intended not to repair their own injuries, but to ravage the country of their neighbours [k].

ALCAMENES king of Sparta, at the head of a complete army, entered the Meſſenian territory ſuddenly and by night, in conſequence of which he eaſily ſurprized the city of Amphea, the gates of which were open as uſual, the inhabitants not having the leaſt ſuſpicion of what afterwards happened. The Spartans behaved on this occaſion very cruelly, they ſlew without diſtinction all who came in their way, nor did even temples or altars afford a ſanctuary to ſuch as fled thither for protection. The conveniency of the city, which the Lacedæmonians knew would ſerve them as a proper magazine during the war, tempted them to this exploit, and in all probability engaged them to treat the people thus harſhly, that they might make themſelves abſolutely maſters of it and its diſtricts. Euphaes the Meſſenian king on the firſt news of this extraordinary ſtroke, aſſembled his people, and encouraged them to keep up their ſpirits, and not to believe that all was loſt, becauſe Amphea was in the hands of the Lacedæmonians; he likewiſe gave them his opinion of the war, and of the manner in which they might beſt carry it on; he obſerved to them that the Lacedæmonians were not only brave, but were alſo bred up to war as to a trade, nay, were indeed bred up to nothing elſe; whence he inferred, that it was by no means prudent for them to engage in pitched battles with ſuch an enemy. Wherefore his counſel was, that they ſhould carry on a defenſive war in the beſt manner they were able, till by degrees they acquired experience enough to fight the Spartans upon equal terms. The Meſſenians, following his advice, maintained a defenſive war for three years, in which they ſuffered the Spartans to obtain very few advantages over them. In the fourth year Euphaes ventured an engagement, but it was with great circumſpection, for, having intrenched his beſt troops, he drew out his horſe and light-armed forces, ſkirmiſhing with theſe; and when the Spartans drew nearer, and thought to have brought it to a general battle, he withdrew his army behind his retrenchments; and as the Spartans had no materials for filling up the ditch which lay before his works, they were conſtrained to retire, and ſhortly after returned to their own country, where they met with a very indifferent different reception, on account of the oath which they and their forces had taken, never to return till they had thoroughly reduced Meſſenia [l]. A very ſhort time after this both the kings died. As to Nicander, we find little of him in antient authors more than has been already mentioned; with reſpect to Alcamenes, Plutarch hath preſerved ſome paſſages of his life, which ſhew that he was a wiſe and prudent prince [m]. Being once aſked how a prince might beſt ſecure his government, he anſwered, By deſpiſing gain. When the Meſſenians ſought by preſents to have gained him to their intereſt, he refuſed them; and the reaſon of this being demanded, he readily anſwered; If I had taken them, the laws and I could never have agreed. He inherited, it ſeems, a great deal of wealth from his father, and increaſed it by his own management, living ſtill in a plain parſimonious manner; for which being reproached, he ſaid; Is it not a mark of virtue and good ſenſe, when he who has abundance chuſes to live, rather according to reaſon than appetite? It is a misfortune to us, that we know not from whom the author before mentioned copied theſe ſayings; and the reader, it is to be hoped, will excuſe us, if, finding little to ſay of their deeds, we entertain him ſometimes with the ſayings of thoſe Spartan kings.

The Meſſenian war commences. Year after the Flood, 2256. Year before Chriſt, 743.

[k] Pauſan. & Juſtin. ubi ſupra.

Polydorus and Theopompus ſucceed in the Spartan kingdom.

POLYDORUS ſucceeded his father Alcamenes in the kingdom, and Theopompus his father Nicander. With theſe princes the Spartans entruſted a new army, with expreſs inſtructions not to act as their predeceſſors had done, but to put their country in poſſeſſion of a prize which ſhe had ſo long deſired. The Meſſenians, under the command of Euphaes their prince, no longer fled from their enemies, as hitherto they had wont; but prepared to give them battle, as ſoon as a proper opportunity offered. It was not long before they had occaſion to make trial of each other's valour; the Lacedæmonians then marched towards the enemy in battalia, Theopompus commanding the right wing, and Polydorus the left; the Meſſenians diſpoſed their army ſo as beſt to oppoſe the Spartans, Antander and their king Euphaes commanding their left, and Pytharatas their right; the engagement was very obſtinate, the centre in both armies remaining firm; the right right wing of the Spartan army was routed by Euphaes, as was the right wing of the Meſſenian army by Polydorus, Pytharatas their general being ſlain. Theſe advantages, however, were ſo inconſiderable, that neither party durſt purſue the other, and the next day a truce was agreed to, that both ſides might have leiſure to withdraw and bury their dead; after which the Spartans, notwithſtanding the inſtructions they had received, thought fit to return home, the conqueſt of Meſſenia appearing by this time a thing impracticable for the preſent [n]. The reader will obſerve, that we have aſcribed this war to motives of intereſt, which at firſt ſight may ſeem to claſh with what the hiſtorians, whom we have mentioned, have ſaid about it; but that the fact was ſo, putting all circumſtances together, is indubitably true; nay, Polydorus the Spartan king openly profeſſed as much when he went to this war; for ſome of the Meſſenians having demanded of him, If he would fight againſt his brethren, alluding to their and the Lacedæmonians deſcent from the ſame parents, the king readily anſwered, No, but I will put in my claim to an eſtate, to which as yet no body has any good title [o]. The great reſiſtance the Meſſenians made on this ſecond invaſion determined the Spartans not to carry on the war any longer in the ſame manner, but to content themſelves with harraſſing and plundering the country, whereby the ſpirits of their own troops would be kept up, and the Meſſenians worn out and deſtroyed; for in this lay the great advantage of the Spartans, that war was their buſineſs, in which if they were not engaged they were idle, whereas the Meſſenians, having their country affairs to mind, were beggared and deſtroyed by being thus obliged to keep many garriſons, beſides a ſtanding body of troops in the field. To add to theſe misfortunes, which were already almoſt inſupportable, a diſtemper raged in Meſſenia, which differed little from the plague, except that it did not ſweep off ſuch numbers. Theſe misfortunes produced a long and ſerious conſultation among the chief perſons in the kingdom, who at length came to a reſolution to abandon ſuch villages and little towns as were leaſt capable of defence, and to fortify a city which ſtood on the top of the mountain Ithome, to which the inhabitants of the demoliſhed places might repair; from this they promiſed themſelves two things; firſt, that they ſhould be releaſed from the expence of garriſons; ſecondly, that in time of diſtreſs this might be made a place of certain ſafety [p].

[l] Pauſan. in Meſſen. Juſtin. lib. iii. c. 4. [m] Plut. in Apophthegm. Lacon.

[n] Pauſan. ubi ſupra. [o] Plut. in Apophtheg. Lacon.

The Argive or Thyrean war.

THE Spartans were about this time called off from the Meſſenian war to engage with the Argives; the diſpute was about the city Thyrea and its diſtrict, which lying on the borders of Argolis and Laconia, had been an old bone of contention between thoſe ſtates [q]. To avoid a great effuſion of blood, it was by both parties agreed, that three hundred Argives and as many Lacedæmonians ſhould decide the quarrel between the nations, the armies on both ſides retiring. In conſequence of this agreement, theſe ſix hundred men engaged, and fought with ſuch obſtinate reſolution, that when night came on, there were but two Argives, viz. Alcinor and Chromius, and one Spartan, whoſe name was Othryades, left alive. The Argives ran home to their city to carry the news of the victory. Othryades remained in the field of battle and erected a trophy; hence a new diſpute commenced, both parties claiming the victory; the Argives, becauſe two of their men were left; the Spartans, becauſe the Argives fled and left Othryades in poſſeſſion of the field of battle; this produced a new war, in which the Lacedæmonians were victors, a great battle having been fought between their army, under the command of Polydorus, and that of the Argives, with a mighty ſlaughter of the latter. Some would have perſwaded the Spartan king to have purſued this victory, and to have attacked Argos itſelf; but he anſwered with a generoſity becoming his character, that the Spartans ſent him to aſſert their rights, and not to rob others [r]. Thus ended the Argive war, ſome circumſtances of which are variouſly reported (C). Let us now return to the affairs of the Meſſenians after their fortifying Ithome.

THE

[p] Pauſan. ubi ſupra. [q] Herod. lib. i. Pauſan. in Argol.
[r] Suidas in voce Οθρυάδης. Pauſan. in Lacon. Plut. in Apophtheg. Lacon.

(C) In the leſſer treatiſe of parallels between the Greeks and Romans, generally aſcribed to Plutarch, the abovementioned fact ſtands thus: "The Argives and Lacedæmonians being engaged in a diſpute about the city and diſtrict of Thyrea, the Amphictyons decreed, that it ſhould be decided by combat. "The

THE deſire of freeing themſelves from this grievous war with Sparta engaged them to ſend a perſon to conſult the oracle at Delphi; the name of this man was Tiſis, who in his return was attacked by ſome of the Lacedæmonian garriſon in Amphea, from whom, however, he eſcaped, though grievouſly wounded; of which wounds, having firſt revealed the oracle to the king, he died; the purport of it was, that unleſs a virgin of the houſe of the Æpytidæ, that is, the royal family, was ſacrificed to the gods, the war would end in the ruin of their nation; this oracle, when reported, ſtruck the Meſſenians, and eſpecially the royal family, with the utmoſt terror. Lots, however, were caſt, and the daughter of Lyſiſcus taken; but when ſhe ſhould have been ſacrificed, Epebolus the ſoothſayer declared, that ſhe was not Lyſiſcus's daughter, but impoſed upon him by his wife, who thereby ſought to eſcape the imputation of barrenneſs. While the ſoothſayer was ſetting forth this matter to the people, Lyſiſcus withdrew his daughter, and fled with her to Sparta. Upon this Ariſtodemus, one of the royal houſe, freely offered his daughter; a young man, who was preſent, alledged, that he was contracted to her, and that therefore her father had no right over her, which plea being over-ruled, he ſet up another, that he had conſummated his marriage, and that ſhe was actually with child by him; Ariſtodemus, conceiving this to be a diſhonour to his family, ſlew his daughter inſtantly with his own hand, after which opening her womb, he ſhewed it to the people. The ſoothſayer inſiſted that another ſhould be ſacrificed,

The meaſures taken in this ſpace by the Meſſenians.

" The Lacedæmonians choſe for their captain Othryades; the " Argives Therſander; the battle being over, there remained
" only two Argives, whoſe names were Agenor and Cromius,
" who ran ſtrait to the city to carry the news of their victory.
" In the mean time, while all was quiet, Othryades, who was " not quite dead, roſe from the ground, and having propped him-
" ſelf up with two pieces of broken launces, he drew together
" as many ſhields as lay within his reach, and piling them up,
" wrote on the uppermoſt with his own blood theſe words: To " Jupiter the conqueror, guardian of trophies. This creating a " new diſpute, which was again brought before the Amphictyons,
" they went to take a view of the place, and having thoroughly " examined all things, decreed in favour of the Spartans. This " is recorded by Chryſermus in the third book of his Peloponne" ſian hiſtory (18).

(18) Plutarch. in Paral. p. 606.

ficed, the daughter of Ariſtodemus having rather died by the paſſion of her father, than as a victim; but all the family of the Æpytidæ joined with the king, who perſuaded the people, that the oracle was fulfilled by the death of Ariſtodemus's daughter. Public rejoicings therefore were made, and the Meſſenians concluded, that whenever the war ſhould be renewed they would be victors [s].

The Spartans renew the war with the Meſſenians.

Six years after the flight of Lyſiſcus, and eight from the fortifying of Ithome, the Lacedæmonians entered Meſſenia again with a great army. The Meſſenians might undoubtedly have received great aſſiſtance from their neighbours, if they had carried on the war as they were wont, that is defenſively; but they, confiding in the oracle, were eager for an engagement, which, ſuiting the Spartan method of making war, quickly fell out; this battle, like the former, though obſtinately fought, was not deciſive, the night parting them; Euphaes, however, venturing too far againſt Theopompus the Spartan king, was mortally wounded, and fell down; this, far from checking the ſpirit of the Meſſenians, made them the more eager, inſomuch, that a warm conteſt began about carrying off the dying king, in which the Meſſenians prevailed, though with the loſs of Antander, one of their beſt captains; Euphaes, being carried back to Ithome, expired in a few days, after a reign of thirteen years, which had been one continual ſcene of war and confuſion. Euphaes leaving no iſſue behind him, the people claimed a right of electing out of the royal family, whereupon Cleonnis, Damis, and Ariſtodemus put in their claims; the people elected the laſt, notwithſtanding the ſoothſayers alledging he was incapable on account of his having ſlain his daughter. This new monarch was no ſooner ſeated on his throne, than he began to negotiate with the Arcadians, Argives, and Sicyonians, in order to draw them to his aſſiſtance againſt the Lacedæmonians, wherein he was very ſucceſsful, almoſt all the Peloponneſians beginning to be apprehenſive of the mighty power and warlike genius of that nation. At the ſame time Ariſtodemus laboured with all his might to unite the minds of his countrymen, and to engage them to behave bravely in a war which ſo nearly concerned them, and on the event of which it depended, whether for the future they ſhould be freemen or ſlaves; with this view he ſhowered his favours upon all, he raiſed his competitors to the chief dignities in the

[s] Pauſan. in Meſſen.

the kingdom, he conferred honours on men of birth and fortune, and diſtributed money amongſt the people. Such was the beginning of Ariſtodemus's reign, who was an avowed and moſt dangerous enemy to the Spartans [t].

The ephori created at Sparta.

ABOUT this time, as the beſt authors agree, a great change was made in the Spartan republic, which is aſcribed to Theopompus, who ſeeing the neceſſity of leaving magiſtrates to execute the laws, when the kings were obliged to be in the field, appointed the ephori, who afterwards made ſo great a figure in the Spartan ſtate [u]. Some think, that they were at firſt the king's friends to whom they delegated authority, which is very probable; but they ſoon grew to have no dependence on the kings, but on the contrary made the kings dependent upon them. They were five in number, choſen by the people out of their own body, ſometimes out of the very dregs of it; for whoever was a bold, factious, talking citizen, was moſt likely to be elected into this office; they were in fact a kind of tribunes of the people, and placed as checks on the ſenate and kings; they were annually elected, and in order to effect any thing, the unanimous voice of the college was requiſite; as to their authority, it was in a manner boundleſs, they preſided in popular aſſemblies, collected their ſuffrages, declared war, made peace, treated with foreign princes, determined the number of forces that ſhould be raiſed, appointed the funds to maintain them, and diſtributed rewards and puniſhments in the name of the ſtate; they likewiſe held a court of juſtice, enquired into the behaviour of all magiſtrates, inſpected into the deportment and education of youth, had a particular juriſdiction over the Helotes, and in ſhort by degrees drew the whole adminiſtration into their own hands. This Theopompus's queen is ſaid to have conjectured on their firſt appointment, which made her reproach her husband with ſuffering the regal dignity to deſcend to his children mutilated, and in a worſe condition than he received it from his anceſtors. Theopompus anſwered her with great prudence, that, far from having leſſened or injured the regal authority, he had ſtrengthened and ſecured it, becauſe the people, being ſatisfied by this inſtitution, would have leſs inclination to run into tumults and ſeditions, in which princes are never ſafe [x].

One

[t] Pauſan. in Lacon. & Meſſen. [u] Ariſt. Polit. lib. v. c. 11. Plut. in vit. Cleom. Valer. M. lib. iv. [x] Ariſt. Polit. ii. Plut. in vit. Ageſil. Plat. de legib. iii. Polyb. lib. iv.

One great privilege of the ephori was, that they did not riſe up at the preſence of the kings, as all other magiſtrates did [y]; another, that from the firſt elected of theſe magiſtrates the year was denominated, as at Athens from the firſt of the archons [z]; the third high mark of their authority was, that if the kings offended againſt the laws, or were guilty of any ſort of exceſs, the ephori took cognizance thereof, and puniſhed them [a]. Some diſputes there are as to the nature and extent of this office, which will be diſcuſſed in the notes, but it is now time to reſume the thread of the hiſtory (D).

THE

[y] Xenoph. de Repub. Lacedæm. [z] Pauſan. Lacon. [a] Plut. Inſtit. Lacedæm.

(D) We have in the text placed the inſtitution of the ephori under the reign of Theopompus, though it muſt be owned, that not only Herodotus in his hiſtory (19), but Xenophon alſo, treating expreſly of the republic of Lacedæmon, aſcribes the ſettling of the ephori to Lycurgus (20). It is fit therefore, that we give our Reaſons why we have rejected theſe authorities, which certainly would be admitted in any other caſe, and have placed the ephori a hundred and thirty years lower than Lycurgus. Firſt then, we think, that the nature of this office very little agrees with that legiſlator's ſcheme of government, ſince he ſeems to have ſought, as far as in him lay, to ſupport the authority of the kings and nobility; otherwiſe, why did he inſtitute the ſenate? or why did he leave to the people in their general aſſembly nothing more than a negative voice? We do admit that theſe arguments would be of no weight at all againſt ſuch authorities as Herodotus and Xenophon, if there had not been writers of no leſs character on the other ſide. For, ſecondly, Ariſtotle is expreſs in placing their inſtitution lower (21); Plutarch in his life of Cleomenes introduces that prince, aſſigning them the ſame inſtitution which we have done; beſides Theopompus's anſwer to his queen is recorded by authors of the beſt credit (22). So that on the whole, it is by far more probable, that this office began under the reigns of Theopompus and his collegue, rather than under that of Charilaus. Undoubtedly their power grew by very ſlow degrees, and that at their firſt inſtitution they were far from having that authority, which in after-times they exerciſed with ſo high a hand. Some have imagined, that they were at firſt appointed

(19) Herod. lib. i. (20) Xenoph. de Repub. Lacedæm. (21) Ariſt. Politic. lib. v. (22) Ariſt. ubi ſupra. Plutarch. in vit. Lycurg. Valer. Max. lib. iv.

THE adminiſtration of affairs at home being thus provided for, the Spartan kings renewed the Meſſenian war, and having engaged the Corinthians to lend them ſome aſſiſtance, they marched with a great army towards Ithome. Ariſtodemus, like a great captain, diſpoſed his own forces and thoſe of his confederates in the beſt manner poſſible; himſelf and Cleonnis commanded the heavy-armed forces, thoſe who were light-armed being committed to the care of Damis; the Argives and Sicyonians he oppoſed to the Corinthians; and the choiceſt of the Arcadian troops, with the flower of the Meſſenian infantry, he ranged againſt the Lacedæmonians; the light-armed ſoldiers were poſted behind the hill, and all things thus diſpoſed, the battle began with great vigour on both ſides; the Lacedæmonians, though appoited by the kings at their pleaſure, but that afterwards the people got the power of electing them into their hands; nay, thoſe who have this notion have aſſigned the time, viz. in the fifty-fifth olympiad, when Chilo was the firſt of the ephori, that is the Eponymos, or him from whom the year took its name; but as there is no authority of any antient author offered in ſupport of this notion, and as it is founded only on the ſuppoſed ſenſe of a paſſage in Diogenes Laertius, it is ſufficient that we have mentioned it, nor are we bound to refute it. It is true, that Cleomenes, in his ſpeech recorded by Plutarch, alledges the ſame thing, that they were originally appointed by the kings, though he does not aſſign the time when their election was veſted in the people, which yet it would have been natural for him to have done, if that time had been exactly known; the truth ſeems to be, that the election was always in the people, but that king Theopompus firſt deviſed this expedient of creating ephori for the preſervation of the public peace; nor are we to regard what Cleomenes ſays as the opinion of Plutarch, or as an authority indubitable in all its circumſtances; for he delivered this diſcourſe to the people after he had taken away the ephori, and therefore it is to be preſumed he would ſay any thing that might ſerve to colour his deſigns; but we find it elſewhere recorded by the ſame author, that the ephori gave this account of the inſtitution of this office, that they were intended to be arbitrators between the kings, when their diſputes were likely to prove fatal to the ſtate (23). We ſhall hereafter have occaſion frequently to mention the conduct of theſe magiſtrates, and the methods they took to enlarge their authority; at preſent we have done all that was neceſſary, in producing the reaſons which have engaged us to believe, that the ephori were ſet up under the reign of Theopompus, but were always elected by the people.

The Spartans again invade Meſſenia. Year after the Flood, 2276. Before Chriſt, 723.

(23) Plut. in vit. Agid.

though hard preſſed, ſtood firmly in their poſts, and the Corinthians behaved very bravely for a long time, but when, on a ſignal given, the light-armed forces commanded by Damis took them in flank, and bya ſhower of miſſive weapons deſtroyed a great many men; they were at laſt conſtrained to betake themſelves to flight with very conſiderable loſs, tho' the number be not aſcertained. The Spartans were exceedingly afflicted at this miſcarriage, and the Corinthians were ſadly diſtreſſed, for they knew not which way to retreat, having on every ſide an enemy's country to paſs through before they could reach home [b]. The Lacedæmonians continued the war, and ſent deputies to conſult the oracle at Delphi on its event; the Meſſenians did ſo too; to the former the oracle anſwered to this purpoſe, By fraud, (i. e. of Creſphontes) Meſſenia was obtained, and by fraud it muſt be ſubdued. To the latter the oracle alſo gave an anſwer, but ſo perplexed and obſcure, that no body either could explain it, or pretended to explain it; the Spartans, in purſuance of their reſponſe, contrived many ſtratagems, and at laſt fixed upon this; they pretended to condemn a hundred men for treaſon, ſecretly inſtructing them to fly to Ithome as ſuppliants, from whence they might eaſily give their fellow-citizens notice of all the enemy's councils; in this they followed the example of Ulyſſes, but not with the like ſucceſs, for Ariſtodemus, immediately penetrating the fraud, obliged the pretended deſerters to return home, and directed them to tell the Spartans, that though their injuſtice was new, yet their trick was ſtale [c]. Some time after they began to be extremely alarmed by ill omens at Ithome, Ariſtodemus himſelf had ill-boding dreams, wherein his daughter appeared to him and upbraided him with her death. They had recourſe to the old remedy, ſending deputies to Delphi, and theſe deputies brought them advice, that whoever firſt dedicated a hundred tripods in the temple of Jupiter at Ithome ſhould remain maſters of the place. This raiſed the ſpirits of the Meſſenians again, who, having no money to make the tripods of braſs, immediately fell to cutting them out in wood. The oracle being ſent from Delphi to Sparta, one Oebalus, a crafty workman, made a hundred little tripods in clay, and, diſguiſing himſelf like a fowler, got into Ithome, and having placed them in the temple of Jupiter, eſcaped. The Meſſenians at this were again ſtruck with deſpair, eſpecially when they found the city city inveſted by a great army from Sparta; Ariſtodemus encouraged them a while, but perceiving all things go ill, and that the city in ſpight of all his care would at laſt fall into the hands of the enemy, he fell himſelf into a deep melancholy, and going one night to the tomb of his daughter, there laid violent hands on himſelf [d]. On his demiſe the Meſſenians did not elect any other king, but choſe Damis their chief by the title of general only. He did for them all that man could do; but all proving ineffectual, ſuch of the Meſſenians as had any hopes of a good reception fled into the adjacent countries; the reſt, together with the city of Ithome, were conſtrained to ſubmit themſelves to the Spartans, who treated them with great rigour. Polyœnus indeed tells us [e], that Ithome was taken by the following ſtratagem: Theopompus with part of the army pretended to deſert his collegue, actually removing from the camp and pitching behind the city; the Meſſenians greedily laid hold of this opportunity of falling on Polydorus, with whom they were no ſooner thoroughly engaged, than Theopompus with his forces attacked the city and took it by ſtorm. However this matter happened, Ithome was certainly raſed by the Lacedæmonians, and the Meſſenians, who remained in their own country, were tied to theſe conditions; firſt, that they ſhould cultivate their lands with all diligence and render half their fruits to the Spartans; and ſecondly, when any of the nobles of Sparta, or either of the kings, died, they and their wives were to attend at the funeral proceſſion in their weeds, on pain of ſuffering the higheſt penalties if they neglected. Beſides, the Spartans gave away a part of their territories which bordered on the ſea to the Aſinei, and another part to the deſcendants of Androcles [f]; this was the end of the famous Meſſenian war, which makes ſuch a figure in the Greek hiſtorians; that is to ſay at this time; for we ſhall ſee it break out again hereafter, and create new troubles to the Spartans.

[b] Pauſan. Meſſen. [c] Pauſan. Lacon.

Sparta loſes both her kings after the Meſſenian war.

SOME time after this war was over the Spartans loſt both their kings, whoſe characters therefore we ſhall take this opportunity of giving our readers, with all the certainty and impartiality we may. Theopompus was a wiſe and gentle prince, as in a great meaſure appears from an anſwer he made to the following queſtion; By what means a mo[d] Pauſan. Meſſen. & Lacon. [e] Strateg. lib. 1. c. 15.

[f] Pauſan. Lacon.

a monarch might live with the greateſt ſafety? Let him (anſwered the king) permit his friends to adviſe him freely, and be himſelf always ready to puniſh the wicked ſtrictly, and with a good will [g]. He loſt his ſon Archidamus a little before the Argive war, which was the reaſon that the conduct thereof was committed to his collegue. It is very probable, that there were great ſtirs in Sparta during their reigns, for beſides eſtabliſhing the ephori, theſe kings had recourſe to the contrivance before-mentioned, of ſubſtituting a new clauſe in the Rhetra concerning laws, whereby they reſtrained the power of the people [h]. The Pillians, having received great favours from this prince, were inclined to pay him exceſſive honours, which he declined by this ſhort meſſage; Moderate honours time increaſes, but takes the immoderate away. He died in peace a natural death, after a long and glorious reign [i]. Polydorus was a prince of the moſt amiable qualities, brave in war, prudent in peace, mild and juſt in both; he was prodigiouſly beloved by his people, yet in the end died a violent death; for one Polemarchus, a Spartan of a conſiderable family and who was himſelf eminent in the ſtate, killed him, for what reaſon is unknown [k]. The Lacedæmonians, as a grateful teſtimony of their juſt ſenſe of his merit, honoured his memory with a ſtatue, and, which ſurpaſſed the uſual meaſure of their favours, ordered his effigies to be engraven on the ſeal which their public magiſtrates were to make uſe of for the future, as if they were deſirous of placing the example of this excellent prince continually before their eyes; a noble inſtance ſurely of their gratitude, and his virtues [e].

Eurycrates and Zeuxidamus. Year after the Flood, 2290. Year before Chriſt, 709.

EURYCRATES ſucceeded his father Polydorus, and Zeuxidamus the ſon of Archidamus his grandfather Theopompus, theſe princes reigned with great tranquillity, there happening no foreign war in their time, neither the Meſſenians nor the Argives having yet recovered ſpirit enough to begin any new diſturbances; at home, however, a conſpiracy was diſcovered, which might have been very prejudicial to the ſtate. The accounts we have of it are various from various authors, but to us it ſeems reaſonable, that the relation of Ephorus the hiſtorian ſhould be preferred [m]. The Spartans, when they were engaged in the Meſſenian war, having been ten years abſent from the city, ty, becauſe of the oath they had made not to return till they had entirely ſubdued that country; the women ſent to them to put them in mind, that while they were ſo careful to ſubdue their enemies, they neglected the city; upon which they decreed, that ſuch young men amongſt them as came out of Sparta under age, and ſo were not obliged by the oath, ſhould return, and aſſociating themſelves promiſcuouſly with the unmarried women, preſerve the city from falling to decay. This project being carried into execution, ſuch as were born of theſe young women were ſtiled Partheniæ, i. e. ſons of virgins. When the Lacedæmonians returned after the reduction or Meſſenia, they viſibly neglected theſe young men, who at the ſame time found themſelves under great difficulties, having neither parents to apply to, nor inheritances to expect; they therefore began to intrigue with the Helotes, who were as unhappy as they could be, determining to fall upon the citizens at a general aſſembly, and to open to themſelves a path to riches and honours with their ſwords. They went ſo far as to appoint the ſignal for the attack, which was to be the throwing up of a cap; but ſome of the Helotes dreading the conſequences diſcovered the whole matter, and when the time was come for the aſſembly, in which the conſpiracy was to be executed, the cryer by command of the ephori made proclamation, that no man ſhould throw up his cap, whereby the Partheniæ underſtood that their deſign was diſcovered; the Lacedæmonians did not, however, treat them harſhly, but weighing the hardſhips they were under, and conſidering at the ſame time their numbers and their intrigues with the Helotes, they wiſely agreed to paſs the matter by, and by public decree permitted Phalanthus, who had been the ringleader in this buſineſs, to ſail with them over into Italy, where they ſettled themſelves in Tarentum [n]. Such was the iſſue of a very dangerous buſineſs, and which fully proves the ſhallowneſs of human policy, which in this caſe was driven to undo what it had before brought to paſs, and which when it was brought to paſs, no doubt was interpreted as an extraordinary ſtroke of wiſdom. Farther particulars of theſe kings we have none, except a few ſayings of Zeuxidamus, which are of no great importance [o].

[g] Plut. Apophth. Lacon. & Inſt. Lacon. [h] Plut. in vit. Lycurg. [i] Pauſan. Lacon. [k] Idem, ibid. [l] Pauſan. in Lacon. Herodot. hiſt. lib. vii. Plut. in Apophthegm. [m] Apud Strabon. Geogr. lib. vi. Juſtin. lib. iii. c. 5.

Anaxander

[n] Strabo ubi ſupra. Heracl. de Polit. Euſeb. in Chron. Can.
[o] Pauſan. in Lacon. Plut. in Apophthegm. Lacon.

Anaxander and Anaxidamus. Year after the Flood, 1314. Year before Chriſt, 683.

Anaxander ſucceeded his father Eurycrates, as Anaxidamus did his father Zeuxidamus; in their reign the ſecond Meſſenian war began, for theſe poor people, having for a long time born the cruel treatment of their inſulting lords, became at laſt unable to ſuſtain it longer. Ariſtomenes the ſon of Nicomedes of Andania, deſcended of the royal blood, was the chief promoter of this revolt; he was bold, enterprizing, intrepid, a man of ſtrong judgment, ſtrict honour, and enthuſiaſtically fond of liberty and his country. He perceived, that the Argives and Arcadians were friends only by force to the Spartans, wanting and wiſhing an opportunity to revenge the many injuries which had been done them by this haughty nation. To theſe Ariſtomenes applied, and receiving an anſwer more conformable to his wiſhes than his expectation, he engaged his countrymen unanimouſly to take up arms thirty-nine years after the taking of Ithome, as Pauſanias relates, though Juſtin and Euſebius allow an interval of eighty years between the firſt and ſecond Meſſenian war [p], which is far from being probable, though, as we ſhall hereafter ſhew, this variance is not altogether unaccountable. About a year after the revolt began, and before either party had received any auxiliaries, the Spartans and Meſſenians met at a village called Deræ, where an obſtinate engagement enſued; Ariſtomenes behaved himſelf ſo well therein, that he brought victory to his ſide, and was conceived to have performed more than mortal atchievements; in gratitude therefore, reſpect being alſo had to his deſcent from Egyptus, his countrymen unanimouſly ſaluted him king, which title he modeſtly waved, alledging that he took arms to ſet them free, and not to make himſelf great: He conſented, however, to accept the title of general, with a power of doing whatſoever he thought requiſite for the ſervice of the public. Knowing well the ſuperſtition of the age in which he lived, he reſolved to intimidate the Spartans, by ſhewing them what he was ſure they would take for an ill omen. Diſguiſing himſelf therefore, he went privately to the city, where in the night he hung up a ſhield on the wall of the temple of Minerva, with this inſcription; Ariſtomenes dedicates this of the ſpoils of the Spartans to the goddeſs. It was eaſily perceived, that this war would be both long and bloody; the Lacedæmonians therefore ſent deputies to Delphi to enquire of the oracle concerning its event; the anſwer they brought brought was, That it behoved the Spartans to ſeek a leader from Athens. The Athenians, naturally envious of the Spartans, granted their requeſt indeed, but in ſuch a manner as manifeſted their ſpight, for they ſent them for a general Tyrtæus a ſchool-maſter and poet, lame of one foot, and who was ſuſpected to be a little out of his wits. But here their ſkill failed them, for this captain, notwithſtanding his deſpicable appearance, proved of mighty conſequence to Sparta, teaching them how to uſe good fortune, and how to bear up under ill [q]. In the mean time Ariſtomenes had drawn together a mighty army, the Eleans, Argives, Sicyonians, and Arcadians, having ſent troops to his aſſiſtance, the Spartans in this as in the former war having no ally but Corinth. The Spartan kings, according to the cuſtom of their city, no ſooner took the field, than, notwithſtanding their inferiority in number, they offered the enemy battle, which Ariſtomenes readily accepted; it was long, obſtinate, and bloody, but in the end the Meſſenians were victorious, and the Lacedæmonians put to flight with a great ſlaughter; Ariſtomenes purſued them, notwithſtanding Theocles the ſoothſayer called him back, perceiving Caſtor and Pollux in a tree, by which there was a neceſſity of paſſing in the purſuit, which he continuing notwithſtanding, when he came to that tree, loſt his ſhield, which gave the Lacedæmonians an opportunity of withdrawing without further loſs. It is ſcarce to be conceived how much the Spartans were ſtruck with this defeat; they grew weary of the war, diſſatisfied with their kings, diffident of their own power, and, in a word, ſunk into a ſtate of general uneaſineſs and want of ſpirit. It was now that the Athenian general convinced them, that he was capable of fulfilling all the promiſes of the oracle; he encouraged them by his poems, he directed them by his counſels, and recruited their broken armies with choſen men from among the Helotes; he ſhewed them the folly of diffidence, and rouſed them to the practice of thoſe virtues for which Sparta had been famous. Ariſtomenes, on the other hand, acted with no leſs prudence and vigour, he thought it not enough to reſtore the reputation of the Meſſenians, if he did not alſo reſtore their wealth and power; he therefore taught them to act offenſively againſt their enemies, and entering the territories of Sparta he took and plundered Pharæ, a conſiderable borough in Laconia, putting all ſuch as made any reſiſtance to the ſword, carrying off at the ſame time an immenſe booty ; this, however, was an injury which the Spartans could not brook with patience, they therefore ſent immediately a body of forces to overtake the Meſſenians, which accordingly they did, but little to their profit ; for Ariſtomenes routed theſe purſuers, and continued to make a mighty ſlaughter of them, till ſuch time as he was diſabled by having a ſpear thruſt through his thigh, which occaſioned his being carried out of the battle [r] ; his cure, which took up ſome time, being finiſhed, he reſolved to carry the war to the very gates of Sparta, and to that purpoſe raiſed a very great army ; but whether he found his deſign impracticable, or was really diverted by ſome dream, he gave out, that Caſtor and Pollux with their ſiſter Helena had appeared to him, and commanded him to deſiſt. A ſhort time after this retreat, going with a ſmall party to make an incurſion, and attempting to take priſoners ſome women, who were celebrating religious rites near Egila a village in Laconia, thoſe zealous matrons fell upon him and his ſoldiers with ſuch fury, that they put them to flight and took him priſoner ; however, he ſoon afterwards made his eſcape and rejoined his forces [s]. In the third year of the war the Spartans with a great force entered Meſſenia, whither Ariſtocrates king of Arcadia was come with a great body of troops to the aſſiſtance of his allies ; Ariſtomenes therefore made no difficulty of fighting when the Spartans approached, but they entering privately into a negotiation with Ariſtocrates, engaged him with bribes and promiſes to betray his confederates. When therefore the battle began, the deceitful Arcadian repreſented to the forces under his command the mighty danger they were in, and the great difficulty there would be of retreating into their own country, in caſe the battle ſhould be loſt ; he then pretended, that the ſacrifices were ominous, and having terrified his Arcadians into that diſpoſition of mind fitteſt to ſerve his purpoſe, he not only drew them off from both wings, but in his flight forced through the Meſſenian ranks and put them too in confuſion. Ariſtomenes and his troops, however, drew themſelves into cloſe order, that they might defend themſelves the beſt they could, and indeed they had need of all their valour and ſkill, for the Lacedæmonians, who expected this event, immediately immediately attacked and ſurrounded them on all ſides. Fortune was on this occaſion too powerful either for the courage or the conduct of the Meſſenians, ſo that notwithſtanding their utmoſt efforts, moſt of their army were cut to pieces, and amongſt them the chief of their nobility. Ariſtomenes, with the poor remains of his ſhattered forces, retired as well as he could, and perceiving that it was now impoſſible to maintain the war againſt the Lacedæmonians upon equal terms, he exhorted his countrymen to fortify mount Era, and to make the beſt diſpoſitions poſſible for a long defence; he likewiſe placed garriſons in Pylus and Methone on the ſea-coaſts, and to theſe three places he gathered all the inhabitants, leaving the reſt of Meſſenia to the mercy of the Spartans. They, on the other hand, looked on the war as now in a manner finiſhed, for which reaſon they divided the lands amongſt their citizens, and cauſed them to be carefully cultivated, while they beſieged Era; but Ariſtomenes quickly convinced them that the war was far from being over. He choſe out of all the Meſſenians three hundred men, with whom he ravaged all the adjacent country, carried off prodigious booty, and when Meſſenia could no longer ſupply the wants of his garriſon, he penetrated into Laconia, and bore away corn, wine, cattle, and whatever elſe was neceſſary to the ſubſiſtence of his countrymen ſhut up in Era; ſo that at laſt the Spartans were conſtrained to iſſue a proclamation, forbidding the cultivation not only of the Meſſenian territory in their hands, but alſo of Laconia in its vicinity, whereby they diſtreſſed themſelves more than their enemies, inducing at laſt a famine in Sparta itſelf, which brought with it its uſual attendant ſedition. Here again all things had gone wrong, if the wiſdom of the poet Tyrtæus had not ſupported the Spartan courage, nor was it without much difficulty that he influenced them to continue the blockade of Era, and to maintain a flying camp for the ſecurity of the country [t].

[p] Pauſan. in Meſſen. Juſtin. lib. iii. Euſeb. in Chron. Can.

[q] Strab. Geogr. lib. viii.

[r] Pauſan. Meſſen. Polyæn. Strateg. lib. ii. c. 31. [s] Id. ibid.

The Meſſenian war continued with the utmoſt vigour.

ARISTOMENES, in ſpight of all theſe precautions, committed terrible depredations with his ſmall corps of three hundred men. Amongſt other places which he plundered, the city of Amyclæ was one, from whence he carried not only a great quantity of riches, but alſo many carriages laden with proviſions. The kings of Sparta lying with their troops in its neighbourhood, as ſoon as they heard of this expedition, marched after Ariſtomenes with the utmoſt diligence, and as the Meſſenians were encumbered with their booty, they came up with them before he could reach Era. In this ſituation of things, Ariſtomenes, prompted rather by deſpair than prudence, diſpoſed his troops in order of battle, and, notwithſtanding they were ſo few, made a long and vigorous reſiſtance againſt the whole Lacedæmonian army. At length, however, numbers prevailed, the greateſt part of the Meſſenians were ſlain on the ſpot, and Ariſtomenes and about fifty of his men who ſurvived the ſlaughter, were taken priſoners, that cheiftain having received ſo many wounds, that he was ſenſeleſs when they carried him away. The Lacedæmonians expreſſed the loudeſt joy at the ſight of this illuſtrious captive, who for ſo many years by his ſingle abilities had enabled his exhauſted country to defend itſelf againſt the whole force of Sparta. When he was recovered of his wounds, they decreed him and all his fellow priſoners to be thrown together into a deep cavern, which was the common puniſhment of the loweſt kind of offenders. This judgment was executed with its utmoſt ſeverity, excepting that Ariſtomenes had leave to put on his armour. Three days he continued in this diſmal place, lying upon and covered with dead bodies; the third day he was almoſt famiſhed through want of food, and almoſt poiſoned with the ſtench of corrupted carcaſſes, when he heard a fox gnawing a body near him, upon this he uncovered his face, and perceiving the fox juſt by him, he with one hand ſeized it's hind-leg, and with the other defended his face by catching hold of the foxe's jaw when he attempted to bite him. Following as well as he could his ſtraggling guide, the fox at laſt thruſt his head into a little hole, and Ariſtomenes then letting go his leg, he forced his way through, and opened a paſſage to the welcome rays of light, from which the noble Meſſenian had been ſo long debarred. Feeble as he was, Ariſtomenes wrought himſelf an outlet with his nails, and, travelling by night with all the expedition he could, at length arrived ſafe at Era, to the great joy and amazement of his countrymen. When this news was firſt blazed abroad, the Spartans would have had it paſs for a fiction, but Ariſtomenes ſoon put the truth of it out of doubt, by falling upon the poſts of the Corinthians, who, as the allies of the Spartans had a conſiderable body of troops before Era. Moſt of their officers, with a multitude of private men, he ſlew, pillaged their camp, and in ſhort did ſo much miſchief, that the Spartans, under a pretence of an approaching feſtival, agreed to a ceſſation of arms for forty days, that they might have time to bury their dead. On this occaſion Ariſtomenes for the ſecond time celebrated the Hecatomphonia, or the ſacrifice appointed for thoſe who had killed a hundred of the enemy with their own hands; he had performed the ſame before, after his ſecond battle when he loſt his ſhield; and he lived to do it a third time, which muſt appear wonderful to the reader, when he is informed, that notwithſtanding this truce, certain Cretan archers in the ſervice of the Spartans ſeized Ariſtomenes, as he was walking without the walls, and carried him away priſoner [u]. There were nine of them in all, who immediately ran away with the news to Sparta, and ſeven remained to guard their prize, whom they bound and conducted to a lone cottage, inhabited only by a widow and her daughter. It ſo fell out, that the young woman dreamt the night before, that ſhe ſaw a lion without claws, bound and dragged along by wolves, and that ſhe having looſed his bonds and given him claws, he immediately tore the wolves to pieces. As ſoon as Ariſtomenes came into the cottage, and her mother, who knew him, had told the daughter who he was, ſhe inſtantly concluded that her dream was fulfilled, and therefore plied the Cretans with drink, and when they were aſleep, took a poignard from one of them, cut the thongs with which Ariſtomenes was bound, and then put it into his hands; he preſently verified her viſion by putting all his guards to death, and then carried her and her mother to Era, where, as a reward for her ſervice, he married the young woman to his ſon Gorgus, then about eighteen years of age. When Era had held out near eleven years, it fell into the hands of Sparta by an accident; the ſervant of one Empiramus a Spartan commander, driving his maſter's cattle to drink at the river Neda, met frequently with the wife of a Meſſenian, whom he engaged in an amour; this woman gave him notice that her huſband's houſe was without the wall, ſo that he could come to it without danger when the good man was abroad, and ſhe likewiſe gave him intelligence when her huſband was upon duty in the garriſon. The Spartan failed not to come at the time appointed, but they had not been long in bed before the huſband returned, which put the houſe into great confuſion; the woman however ſecured her gallant, and then let in the good man, whom ſhe received with the perfidious flattery peculiar to her ſex, enquiring again and again by what exceſs of good fortune ſhe was bleſſed with his return; the innocent Meſſenian told her, that Ariſtomenes being detained in his bed by a wound, and the ſoldiers knowing that he could not walk the rounds, had a grant to retire to their houſes to avoid the bittter inclemency of the ſeaſon. The Spartan no ſooner heard this than he crept ſoftly out of doors, and ran poſt haſte to carry the news to his maſter; it ſo fell out, that the kings were at this time abſent from the camp, and Empiramus had the chief command of the army; as ſoon as he received this information, he ordered the army to begin its march, though it rained exceſſively and there was no moon-light; the fellow guided them to the fort, and managed matters ſo well, that they ſeized all the Meſſenian poſts; yet after all they were afraid to engage; darkneſs, a high wind, heavy rain, together with the dread of Ariſtomenes, kept them quiet in the places they had ſeized. As ſoon as it was light the attack began, and Era had been quickly taken, if only the men had defended it; but the women fought with ſuch fury, and, by their mingling in the fray, brought ſuch an acceſſion of numbers, as made the buſineſs doubtful; three days and two nights this deſperate engagement laſted; at laſt all hopes of preſerving the city being loſt, Ariſtomenes drew off his wearied troops. Early the fourth morning he diſpoſed the women and children in the centre, the Meſſenian youth in the front and rear, the leſs able men in the main body, himſelf commanded the van; the rear-guard was brought up by Gorgus and Manticlus, the former the ſon of Ariſtomenes, the latter of Theocles a Meſſenian of great merit, who had fallen with much glory in this attack, fighting valiantly in the cauſe of his country. When all things were ready, Ariſtomenes cauſed the barrier to be thrown open, and brandiſhing his ſpear marched directly towards the Spartan troops in order to force a paſſage. Empiramus, perceiving his intent, ordered his men to open to the right and left, and fairly gave them them a paſſage, ſo that Ariſtomenes marched off, in triumph as it were, to Arcadia. It ſhould ſeem that writing, as we do, the hiſtory of the Lacedæmonians, we ſhould here have done with the Meſſenian captain, the war being now at an end; but it falls out otherwiſe, there is no keeping to the ſtory of Sparta without following this man to his laſt hour [x].

[t] Pauſan. in Meſſen.

of

[u] Pauſan. in Meſſen. Polyæn. Strateg. lib. ii. c. 31. ſect. 2. Stephan. in voce Ανδανια.

THE Arcadians, when they heard that Era was taken, were very deſirous of ſuccouring their old confederates in this deep diſtreſs: they therefore irritated their king Ariſtocrates to lead them into Meſſenia; but he, corrupted by the Lacedæmonians, perſuaded them that it was too late; that the Meſſenians were all cut off, and that ſuch a ſtep would only expoſe them to the fury of the conquerors; when the thing appeared to be otherwiſe, and it was known that Ariſtomenes was on the frontiers of Arcadia, they went in crouds to carry him proviſions, and to teſtify their readineſs to afford him and thoſe under his command all the aſſiſtance in their power. Ariſtomenes deſired to be heard before a general aſſembly, which being accordingly convoked, he there opened one of the boldeſt and beſt-laid ſchemes recorded in hiſtory; he ſaid, that he had yet five hundred undaunted ſoldiers, who at his command would undertake any thing; that it was very probable moſt of the Spartans were employed in pillaging Era; and that therefore he was determined to march and ſurprize Sparta, which appeared ſo feaſible, that all the aſſembly loudly commended his great capacity and unſhaken courage; Ariſtocrates, however, took care to betray him, having by various pretences retarded the execution of the project. The Arcadians, who began to ſuſpect him, waited for and ſurprized his meſſengers as they came back; they took the letters from them, and read them openly in the aſſembly; the purport of them was, that they acknowledged his great kindneſs both now and in the battle, and promiſed that the Lacedæmonians would be grateful. As ſoon as the letters were read, the Arcadians fell to ſtoning their king, frequently calling upon the Meſſenians to aſſiſt them, which, however, they did not, waiting for Ariſtomenes's orders, who, far from triumphing in this ſpectacle, ſtood ſtill with his eyes fixed on the ground which he wet with his tears, his ſoul pierced with ſorrow to ſee a crowned head ſo ſhamefully and ſo deſervedly put to death [y]. The Arcadians afterwards terwards erected a monument over him, with an inſcription to perpetuate his infamy. As for the Meſſenians under the command of Gorgus and Manticlus, they paſſed over into Sicily, where they founded the city of Meſſene, one of the moſt famous in the iſland. Ariſtomenes remained, however, in Greece, where he married all his daughters, except the youngeſt, to perſons of great rank. A prince of Rhodes enquiring of the oracle at Delphi whom he ſhould eſpouſe, that his ſubjects might be happy under his poſterity, was directed to marry the daughter of the moſt worthy of the Greeks, which anſwer was immediately underſtood to point at the virgin daughter of Ariſtomenes; her therefore he demanded and received, Ariſtomenes accompanying him back to his dominions, where he formed a ſcheme of uniting the Lydians and Medes againſt the Spartans, reſolving with this view to go himſelf to Media and to the court of Sardis; but while he meditated theſe great things, death ſurprized him, and thereby freed Lacedæmon from the moſt inveterate enemy ſhe ever had. His ſon-in-law honoured his memory with a moſt magnificent tomb, and as for his fame, all hiſtorians have ſhewn the utmoſt regard in conſerving it (E).

The end of the ſecond Meſſenian war. Year after the Flood, 2331. Before Chriſt 668.

[x] Pauſan. in Meſſen. Juſtin. lib. iii. c. 5. [y] Pauſan. in Meſſen. Polyb. lib. iv. p. 301.

Meſſenia

(E) The ſtory of Ariſtomenes, as we have related it from the beſt authorities among the Greeks, tho' it contains a great many wonderful circumſtances, hath not in it, however, any thing abſurd or incredible; but it is not to be wondered, that ſuch as prefer the marvellous to conſiſtent hiſtory have laid hold of this great man's character to give colour to ſome of their ſtrange ſtories. Pliny has one concerning him, which may perhaps vie with any legend antient or modern; he ſays, that, when he was a third time taken, they were reſolved to ſee wherein he differed from other men; for they could not conceive, that, after ſo many accidents had befallen him, he could poſſibly keep up his ſpirits by the ordinary ſupplies of nature; they therefore cut open his boſom, and thereby diſcovered, as they conceived, the cauſe of his extraordinary courage; and what ſhould this be, but that his heart was hairy, a mighty probable cauſe truly (20)! In the beginning of the laſt Meſſenian war, or rather when Era was firſt beſieged, perſons were ſent to conſult the oracle at Delphi concerning the event; the anſwer was very diſagreeable, being to this purpoſe:

Thy

(20) Plin. hiſt. natur. lib. xi. c. 37. Stephan. Byzan. in voce Ἀνδανια.

Meſſenia once more reduced, the Spartans treated the remaining inhabitants with a ſeverity that became proverbial, making them all ſlaves, and dividing the whole country, excepting the diſtrict of Methone which they gave to the Argives, among their own citizens; whereby they became much more formidable than hitherto they had been, and began already to affect the ſovereignty of Greece. We find nothing farther which deſerves notice recorded of either of the Lacedæmonian kings, unleſs it be a ſaying of Anaxander; of whom it being demanded, Why the Lacedæmonians kept no money in their exchequer, he anſwered, That the keepers thereof might not be tempted to be thieves [z]. Meſſenia divided by the Lacedæmonians.

Eurycrates ſucceeded his father Anaxander, as Archidamus did his father Anaxidamus; of their reigns we know nothing The reigns of Eurycrates and Archidamus.

[z] Plut. in Apophtheg. Lacon. Pauſan. in Lacon.

Thy fate Meſſene, now is near at hand;
Nor can I longer the decree withſtand,
Than till the he goat from its banks ſhall try
To taſte of Neda's ſtreams which ſwiftly fly.

In the Greek the word tranſlated he-goat is Tragos, and from hence it came to paſs, that the Meſſenians were ſcrupulouſly careful that no he-goat ſhould come near the river; but when the fate of Era really approached, it appeared, that the oracle had been quite miſunderſtood; for Theocles the ſooth-ſayer obſerving certain wild fig-trees which grew by the river's ſide, no longer ſhoot their leaves upwards as they were wont to do, but bending them down towards the river, recollected, that though the other Greeks called this tree Olynthos, yet the Meſſenians called it Tragos; he therefore gave notice of this to Ariſtomenes, and told him plainly, that he apprehended the oracle was fulfilled thereby; whereupon Ariſtomenes took a ſacred depoſitum, which Lycus the ſon of Pandion had foretold ſhould be preſerved till the Meſſenians were totally deſtroyed; this he interred in the moſt private part of the mountain Ithome, in doing which he hazarded his life by venturing without the walls of Era (21). There is nothing farther which deſerves to be added to this note, unleſs it be the explanation we promiſed of the different dates aſſigned to the laſt Meſſenian war, which is, however purely conjectural. It is this, that Euſebius did not ſay that the ſecond Meſſenian war began eighty years after the firſt, but that it ended at that time; which is true, if we compute from the firſt diſturbances on account of the death of Teleclus (22).

(21) Pauſan. in Meſſen. (22) Juſtin. lib. iii. c. 4. Euſeb. Chron. Canon.

nothing more than that they passed them in peace and quietness; for though various authors have recorded the names of these princes, remembrance of their actions we find none[a], unless it be the following wise saying of Eurycrates, whom Plutarch calls Eucratides; who, when it was asked him, Why the ephori sat every day to determine causes about contracts, answered, That we may learn to keep our words even with enemies[b]. Archidamus was also called Agasicles, which is the reason that Herodotus, making use of the Ionic dialect, writes his name Hegisicles.

The reigns of Leo and Aristo.

Eurycrates was succeeded by his son Leo, and Archidamus by his son Aristo, princes concerning whom historians are not so silent. Leo was a man of great capacity, and very sollicitous for the strict execution of justice; for it being demanded of him, Under what government a man might live safest, he answered immediately, Where the inhabitants are neither wealthy nor poor, where integrity is sure to meet with many friends, and fraud with none. At the olympic games, when every body commended the victors, How much better, said he, would it have been, if these men had laid out the pains they have taken to be swift in learning to be honest[c]! Aristo his collegue is remarkable in history for some extraordinary things which fell out in his family; he had two wives, but was so unfortunate as to have children by neither of them, which put him upon taking a third, though the wife of his friend Agetus, the most beautiful woman in Sparta. In order to obtain her, he contrived this scheme: He took his friend Agetus one day in a gay humour, and having first sworn to give him whatever precious thing he chose belonging to himself, drew from him a like oath; and when Agetus had chosen, the king in consequence of that oath demanded his wife. Agetus protested, that he did not comprehend his wife to be included in the promise that had passed between them; but Aristo insisted, that an oath was to be understood in the sense he who received it took it; Agetus submitted, and the king accordingly took his wife. About seven months after he had taken her, as he sat with the ephori hearing causes, a servant came in great haste to tell him that the queen was brought to bed; upon which, telling the months upon his fingers, he dropped some expressions, as if he doubted whether the child was his; however, he owned owned the boy, and called him Damaratus [d]. During the reigns of Leo and Ariſto the Lacedæmonians were engaged in a war with the Tegeatæ, wherein they were ſucceſsful, as it ſhould ſeem from Pauſanias's account of the matter, though Herodotus tells it otherwiſe [e].

[a] Herodot. lib. i. Pausan. ubi supra. [b] Plut. Apophtheg. Lacon, & in Apoph. Reg. [c] Plut. Apophth. Lacon.

ANAXANDRIDES ſucceeded his father Leo during the lifetime of his collegue Ariſto; in his time the body of Oreſtes, or rather his bones, were recovered and removed. He is reported alſo to have had two wives, which was a ſingular thing in Sparta, for whom he built ſeparate houſes; the reaſon of it was, that the ephori commanded him to divorce his firſt wife, becauſe ſhe bore him no children; but he, not being able to bring himſelf up to this, contented himſelf with taking another wife, by whom he might have children; by her, not long after his marriage, he had Cleomenes; his firſt wife then alſo conceived and brought him a child, who was called Dorieus; the ephori pretending to make ſome ſcruple whether this was really her child or no, the buſineſs was quickly after effectually cleared up by her bearing Leonidas and Cleomenes [f]. This king Anaxandrides was certainly a very wiſe man, and had very juſt notions of government, as, amongſt others of his ſayings recorded by Plutarch, appears from this: That it being demanded of him, Why the Spartans were ſo cautious in paſſing capital judgments, and why, notwithſtanding his acquittal, they ſtill demanded a recognizance of a perſon accuſed; he anſwered, Becauſe in capital caſes execution can never be recalled; and in the other caſe they kept that recognizance, that if it ſo fell out, that the guilt of the perſon acquitted ſhould afterwards appear, he might be liable to a juſter judgment [g]. Ariſto was alſo a prince of great worth and probity, and in conſequence thereof, mightily beloved by his people. In the reigns of theſe princes, Crœſus king of Lydia was vanquiſhed, taken priſoner, and an end put to his kingdom by Cyrus; he was during his proſperity a great lover of the Greeks, and particularly of the Lacedæmonians, with whom he had frequent intercourſe, and with whom he endeavoured to make a league in obedience to the command of the oracle, which directed him to ally himſelf to the chief among the Greeks, which he immediately underſtood of the Spartans [h].

Anaxandrides ſucceeds his father Leo.

Anaxandrides

[d] Pauſan. in Lacon. Herodot. lib. vi. Plut. ubi ſupra. [e] lib. i. [f] Pauſan. in Lacon. Herod. lib. v. [g] Plut. Apophth. Lacon. [h] Herod. lib. i.

The reigns of Cleomenes and Damaratus.

Anaxandrides was ſucceeded by his ſon Cleomenes, as Ariſto was by his ſon Damaratus. It was ſtrict regard to hereditary right which induced the Lacedæmonians to place Cleomenes on the throne, for he was known to be at certain times out of his ſenſes, and when he had them, he was cunning, ambitious, and deceitful out of meaſure; whereas his brother Dorieus was remarkable for his prudence, the gentleneſs of his temper, and his ſkill in the art of war; he was ſo much diſguſted, however, at his brother's being preferred before him, that he demanded leave to lead out a colony, whereby he obtained an honourable excuſe for quitting his country [i]. In the very beginning of his reign Cleomenes engaged in a war with the Argives, whom he beat, and having driven a conſiderable body of them into a wood, he cauſed the Helotes to ſet that wood on fire whereby numbers of them were deſtroyed; in all his actions he appears to have been a man of a fierce untractable temper, a great lover of war, in which he ſought only victory, without enquiring whether the means by which he ſought to obtain it were juſt or not; yet he had ſometimes flights of fancy which had the appearance of a great genius; for example, he was wont to ſay, that Homer was the poet of the Lacedæmonians, Heſiod of the Helotes, becauſe the former made war his ſubject, and the latter treated of huſbandry [k]. He was early ſuſpected of having views not much for the advantage or honour of the ſtate; for at his return from the war with the Argives, he was accuſed of having let ſlip manifeſt opportunities of taking Argos itſelf; but the anſwers he gave, when the matter came to be heard before the ephori, were ſo ſatisfactory, that he was acquitted. He was a great friend to Cliſthenes the Athenian and his party, at whoſe requeſt he drove the Piſiſtratidæ out of Athens; afterwards he joined with Iſagoras, whom the Athenias had baniſhed, and endeavoured all he could to veſt in him the ſovereignty of that city, whereby he created great miſchiefs to the Greeks. The Corinthians, who, as we have elſewhere ſeen, were the faſt friends and ſteady allies of the Lacedæmonians, diſguſted at the haughty behaviour of Cleomenes, and at his waſting the territory of Eleuſina, without regard either to the laws of God or men, deſerted them; Damaratus his collegue alſo, who was a very worthy and excellent perſon, oppoſed him; and while he was gone into Ægina, where he pretended to ſeize

[i] Herod. lib. v. Pauſan. ubi ſupra. [k] Plut. Apophth. Lacon.

ſeize the principal perſons in the iſland, under colour that they were in the Perſian intereſt; Damaratus accuſed him to the ephori and the ſenate of being an enemy to peace, a diſturber of Greece, and one who would provoke all the neighbouring ſtates to look with an evil eye on Sparta[1]. Theſe diſcourſes had at firſt their effect; but when Cleomenes returned, he found means not only to get himſelf acquitted, but to get his collegue depoſed, which he wrought after the following manner: He ſuggeſted, that Damaratus's birth was liable to great ſuſpicions, alledging the expreſſion of his father before-mentioned; the Spartans ſent to the oracle at Delphi, in order to have this intricate queſtion decided; Cleomenes foreſaw this, and therefore took care to corrupt the oracle, whereby he carried his point; for, on the return of the deputies with the reſponſe, Damaratus was depoſed, and Leotychides his couſin, the eighth in deſcent from Theopompus, was raiſed to the regal dignity. Such was the moderation of the depoſed king, that, inſtead of quitting his country, he ſtill endeavoured to render it all the ſervice he could, being content to execute inferior magiſtracies. But the intemperance of his ſucceſſor vanquiſhed at length his patience; for Leotychides being one day informed, that Damaratus was ſitting as inſpector in the place of public exerciſes, ſent a ſervant to inſult him, by aſking him this queſtion, How he liked his preſent office after executing that of king. To which Damaratus fiercely anſwered, That himſelf knew the weight of both, which he who ſent him did not; but that this queſtion ſhould either prove the cauſe of great miſery, or of great felicity to Sparta. Then covering his head he retired to his own houſe, where having firſt ſacrificed to Jupiter, he then ſent for his mother, and earneſtly entreated her to tell him the truth as to his birth, whether, as he was reputed, he was the ſon of king Ariſto, or whether, as his enemies ſuggeſted, Agetus was his father. She having in the moſt ſolemn terms aſſured him of his legitimacy, he pretended to take a journey to Delphi, but indeed reſolved to quit Sparta for ever, and to retire where he might be abſolutely ſafe; with this view he went firſt to Elis, from thence to Zacynthus, and at length into Perſia, where he was received by king Darius with the utmoſt civility, had large revenues aſſigned him, and was in every reſpect reſpect uſed as a prince [m]. In his exile he behaved in a manner ſuitable to his dignity, and without ſhewing any rancour againſt his country; as an inſtance of the former, it is recorded of him, that when the Perſian monarch would have puniſhed a nobleman, who had revolted, and afterwards at Damaratus's perſuaſion ſubmitted himſelf to the king, the Spartan generouſly interpoſed, addreſſing the Perſian king in theſe words; It is diſhonourable, O king, not to have had it in thy power to puniſh him when he was a rebel, and as diſhonourable to exert a power of puniſhing now he is become thy friend [n]. With reſpect to the latter, when he found that the Perſian was determined to make war on Greece, we are told, he ſent the firſt advice thereof cut in tables, which he afterwards covered with wax. He was the only king of Sparta who was victor in the olympic games. In a word, he was a perſon of ſuch merit, that none of the Perſians envied the honours and revenues which he acquired in their country, where his poſterity flouriſhed many ages after [o].

[1] Herod. lib. v. Pauſan. Lacon.

Leotychides ſucceeds Damaratus.

Leotychides, as he was raiſed to the kingdom by the craft of Cleomenes, ſo he was entirely governed by him in all that he did; he went with him to Ægina, from whence they brought away ſome of the principal inhabitants priſoners, and left them with the Athenians their mortal enemies; for which he afterwards ſuffered, though he acted merely by the advice and under the influence of Cleomenes. As for that prince, he continued to act as inconſiſtently as formerly, that is, ſometimes with extraordinary virtue, and at other times without the leaſt regard to juſtice. When Ariſtagoras the Mileſian tyrant came to Sparta with an intent to perſuade Cleomenes to make war upon the Perſian king, he heard his propoſals both as to the method of the war, and the private advantages which might accrue to himſelf; but he adviſed his country againſt the former, and abſolutely refuſed to have any thing to do with the latter, wherein he acted with great penetration as well as integrity, for the ſame prince prevailing with the Athenians thereby induced that war, which had well-nigh brought on the total deſtruction of Greece. He likewiſe reſiſted all the ſollicitations of Mæander the tyrant of Samos, who alſo would have tempted him with money; and not only

[m] Herod. lib. xvii. Pauſan. Lacon. [n] Plut. Apophth. Lacon.
[o] Herodot. lib. vii. Pauſan. Lacon.

only ſo, but complained of him to the ephori, telling them, that if they did not baniſh this man out of their territories, he would teach the Lacedæmonians to be knaves. When by degrees his contrivances againſt Damaratus came to light, and the Spartans began to ſhew ſome inclination to examine ſtrictly into that matter, he thought it beſt to fly firſt into Theſſaly, and then into Arcadia, where he immediately excited new troubles, drawing about him a multitude of Arcadians, and endeavouring by a ſolemn oath to bind them to his ſervice. The Spartans, knowing well his enterprizing genius, and being afraid leſt he ſhould excite the Arcadians to invade them, recalled him, and reſtored him to his dignity; but a ſhort time after he returned, he fell mad, running people in the face with his ſceptre as he met them in the ſtreets; upon which they were conſtrained to confine him, and to put on him fetters of wood [P]. In this condition he was attended by a Helot who was his keeper, from whom, partly by fair means, partly by threats, he obtained a ſword, wherewith beginning at the calf of the leg, he ripped himſelf up, and having at length cut out his bowels, fell down dead. Many of the Spartans imputed this extraordinary fact to his corrupting the oracle of Delphi, and thereby procuring the depoſition of Damaratus; the Athenians attributed it to his ſacrilege at Eleuſina; the Argives were as poſitive that it befel him for burning their ſacred grove (F). As for thoſe who

[P] Pauſan. Lacon, Herod. lib. vi.

(F) There is no part of Cleomenes's character more unjuſtifiable than that which regards the Argives, againſt whom he made a war, without obſerving any laws of honour or juſtice. The accounts we have of his exploits againſt this nation are ſo diſſonant, and the circumſtances contained in them ſo incompatible, that it is far from being eaſy to judge, whether the facts mentioned fell out in one and the ſame war, or in ſeveral; and if the latter be the truth, in what parts of his reign they happened. Without troubling our readers with a nice enquiry into theſe particulars, we will give them in few words a detail of the principal matters laid to the charge of Cleomenes. He is ſaid to have been promiſed by an oracle, that he ſhould take Argos; in confidence of which he marched with his army directly towards the city (23); but who were for aſcribing his end to natural cauſes, they alledged, that drinking immoderately with the Scythian embaſſadors, his drunkenneſs iſſued in madneſs [q]. He left behind

(23) Herod. Hiſt. lib. vi. Pauſan. Argol.

[q] Pauſan. ubi ſupra. Herodot. ubi ſupra.

but between him and it lay a conſiderable army of the Argives, who prepared to defend themſelves in the beſt manner they might, though under great diſcouragements from certain reſponſes which they had received, which gave them to apprehend, that they ſhould be overcome by fraud. In order to guard againſt this in the moſt probable manner they could deviſe, they determined to govern their motions by the enemies ſignals, which they eſteemed a certain preſervative againſt being ſurprized (24). But this precaution ſerved only to ruin them; for Cleomenes, having intelligence thereof, gave order to his forces to attack the Argives, when the ſignal was made for them to go to dinner. This being exactly followed, the army of Argos was entirely defeated; for they, beholding the Spartan ſignal for dinner, went immediately to refreſh themſelves, but before they were well ſettled at their meal, the Spartans fell upon them, and ſlaughtered them almoſt without reſiſtance. Their only refuge in this diſtreſs was a thick wood in their rear, into which they retired with all the expedition poſſible. Cleomenes inſtantly deviſed a new ſtratagem for deſtroying them there. He cauſed ſome who were well acquainted with the Argives to call them by name, and promiſe them quarter; yet as faſt as they came out he ordered them to be ſlain. Thus he cut off fifty, thoſe in the grove, becauſe of the thickneſs of the trees, perceiving nothing of what paſſed without. At length an Argive, getting upon an high tree, diſcovered from thence what was doing. The Lacedæmonians then called in vain, no more of the Argives venturing out, which put Cleomenes on a more cruel expedition; he cauſed his Helotes to ſurround the grove with bruſh-wood and other combuſtible matter; and then, ſetting it on fire, burned all the helpleſs wretches. He then enquired to whom the grove was dedicated? To Argos, replied a prieſt. Alas! cried Cleomenes, This oracle has deceived me, this is all the Argos I ſhall take. He afterwards ſacrificed by force on the altar of Diana, and cauſed the prieſt who would have hindred him to be chaſtiſed. The ſacrifices, as ſome ſay, proving unlucky, he deſiſted, and was accuſed at his return for not taking Argos, but on hearing his defence acquitted (25). The general opinion is, that he actually attacked the city with his colleague Damaratus, but was conſtrained to retire by the following means. There was in that city a lady named Teliſſilla, who, being hind him a daughter named Gorgo, one of the most celebrated women of her time. The inhabitants of Ægina upon his death applied themselves to the Spartans, complaining loudly against Leotychides, for that he in conjunction with Cleomenes had been concerned in carrying off the principal men of their island, and putting them into the hands of the Athenians. The Spartans, who, as a nation, piqued themselves much upon their justice, disclaimed the whole of this proceeding, and offered the inhabitants of Ægina to deliver up Leotychides into their hands; but the deputies of that island wisely declined carrying the king of Sparta away; they contented themselves therefore with desiring he might go with them to Athens, there to use his utmost endeavours to rectify the mischief he had done them, by procuring their hostages to be delivered up, which accordingly he did; but his and their applications being fruitless, they suffered him to return again to Sparta, where he still retained the regal dignity, though he never reigned in the hearts of the people, who, as it is their custom, regretted their absent prince, and were angry with the work of their own hands; the consequences of all this we shall hereafter have occasion to explain; let us in the mean time pass to the story of his collegue [r].

(24) Herodot ubi ſupra. (25) Plut. Apophtheg. Lacon.

Leonidas succeeds Cleomenes.

Leonidas the son of Anaxandrides, half-brother to Cleomenes, succeeded him in the kingdom, and married his daughter Gorgo; he was a prince of great moderation, and of a valour superior to most men of his age; some of the Spartans, however, who disliked his family, could not help ing of a very weak constitution, was directed by the oracle to addict herself to the muses. In consequence of this response, she studied poetry with such success, that though on the approach of the Lacedæmonians there were none but women in the city, she inspired them with such resolution, that they shut the gates, took arms, and forced Damaratus, who was already in the suburbs, to retire; as also Cleomenes himself and his army. In memory of this extraordinary event an anniversary solemnity grew into use at Argos, in which women went about in mens cloaths, and men put on womens habits (26). It is agreed by all the antient writers, that Cleomenes laughed at and despised oracles; the reason is clear, because he had corrupted them (27).

[r] Pausan. & Herodot. ubi supra.

(26) Herodot. ubi supra. Polyæn. Strateg. lib. viii. 33. Plut. de virtut. Mulier. (27) Plut. Apophtheg. Lacon.

help ſpeaking diſreſpectfully to him; one of them particularly told him to his face, That, except being a king, he was no better than they; to which Leonidas, ſmiling, anſwered, If I had not been better than you, I had not been a king. When Miltiades the Athenian fought the famous battle of Marathon, the Spartans had promiſed an army, but had ſent none; they arrived a little after the battle, went to the ſpot where it was fought, where having conſidered attentively the prodigious difficulties the Athenians had overcome, and after highly commending them, they returned home again to Sparta [s]. When, as the wiſeſt of the Greeks had foreſeen, this battle at Marathon only excited the Perſian to attempt again the conqueſt of Greece; the Spartans, with a reſolution worthy of the diſciples of Lycurgus, determined to oppoſe them; Damaratus their king was conſtrained to accompany Xerxes in this expedition, though in reſpect to his country he had ſent early notice thereof to Gorgo, the wife of Leonidas, and the daughter of his greateſt enemy. When it was apparent, that Xerxes would enter Greece in perſon with a prodigious army, a general aſſembly was held at the iſthmus, the reſolutions of which were theſe: That the ſtates of Greece ſhould unanimouſly join in defending its liberty againſt the Perſians; that for the preſent all their quarrels amongſt themſelves ſhould be ſuſpended; that the tenth of the ſpoil ſhould be dedicated to Apollo; and that of thoſe who deſerted the common cauſe a decimation ſhould be made, that is, a tenth part ſhould be put to death without mercy [t]. Warm and generous reſolutions, if the ſame ſpirit had accompanied them in the execution; but, alas, when words were to be changed into deeds, of all the confederates the Spartans and Athenians only ſeemed ready to do any thing. The Theſſalians were the firſt who were to feel the weight of Xerxes and his myriads; they therefore ſent to the Greeks to beſeech them to quicken their preparations, or not to blame them if they ſubmitted to an enemy they could not reſiſt. Upon this ten thouſand men were ſent by ſea to Theſſaly under the command of Evenetus a Spartan and Themiſtocles the Athenian; but when they came thither, they were convinced, that this meaſure would prove ineffectual; for in a plain country, as Theſſaly is, there could be no hopes of oppoſing ſuch multitudes of men with a few, eſpecially when it was known, that many of the Theſſalian princes princes could not be depended on, and that many of the paſſages into Theſſaly were in the power of Alexander king of Macedon; the army therefore returned without doing any thing. At the next general council, however, it was reſolved to defend the ſtreights of Thermopylæ; in purſuance of which reſolution ſix thouſand foot were appointed for that ſervice, and the command of them given to Leonidas [u]. Of theſe three hundred only were Spartans, according to the direction of the king; and when ſome principal perſons demanded of him whether he had not a ſecret deſign in his head, he anſwered frankly, I pretend to defend the ſtreights of Thermopylæ, but in truth I go to die for my country; and when they ſtill wondered at the ſmall number of men he took with him, he, turning to thoſe to whom he had communicated his ſecret, ſaid, There are enow, conſidering the deſign we go upon. When he took his leave of his wife, ſhe aſked him if he had no thing particular to ſay to her (G); Marry ſome brave man, ſaid he, and [u] Pauſan. in Lacon. Herod. Hiſt. lib. vii.

[s] Plut. in Apoph. [t] Herodot. lib. vii. Diodor. Sicul. lib. xi.

(G) The character of Gorgo, the daughter of Cleomenes and wife of Leonidas, deſerves to be particularly conſidered. Plutarch, who was ſo fond of the Lacedæmonians, that beſides his inſtitutes he wrote a book of their wiſe ſayings, wrote alſo a particular treatiſe of the women, which was indeed extraordinary; and the reaſon of it was, becauſe the Spardan dames were of a very maſculine diſpoſition, and ſpoke and acted with a freedom denied to their ſex every where elſe. Gorgo, who is to be the ſubject of this note, makes a very conſiderable figure in that treatiſe; but before we proceed to acquaint the reader with what Plutarch ſays of this lady, it will on many accounts be fit to give him a remarkable ſtory recorded of her by Herodotus That noble hiſtorian tells us, that when Ariſtagoras, tyrant of Miletus, attempted to engage Cleomenes in a deſign not only of freeing Ionia, but even of ſubverting the Perſian empire; he brought with him a chart of the known world laid down on braſs: after having ſhewn Cleomenes on this the ſituation of Ionia, and expatiated with great warmth on the glory of an enterprize undertaken for the relief of the Ionians, pointing to his plate, he proceeded thus: "Next theſe the "Lydians inhabit a fertil country abounding in ſilver: And on the "confines of Lydia, theſe Phrygians are placed to the eaſtward, more "rich in cattle, and living in greater affluence, than any other peo-"ple I know. Adjoining to theſe are the Cappadocians, by us cal-"led Syrians, and beyond them the Cilicians, whoſe country ex-"tends to that ſea in which the iſland of Cyprus is ſituate, and bring him brave children [x]. When Xerxes came with his mighty army, he sent a spy to bring him advice of the posture

"pays

[x] Plut. in Apophtheg. Lacon.

" pays an annual tribute of five hundred talents to the king. Next " to the Cilicians are these Armenians, who possess great num- " bers of cattle; and after them the Matianians, beyond whose " territories lies this province of Cissia, in which Susa is built " upon the river Choaspes. In this place the great king resides, " and his vast treasures are here deposited. If you take this city, " you may boldly contend with Jupiter in wealth. You will " not find your account in fighting battles to gain a country of " small extent, narrow limits, and indifferent soil, from the " Messenians who are your equals in war, or from the Arca- " dians and Argians: For none of these nations have either " gold or silver, the desire of which induces so many men to " hazard their lives. But when an opportunity is offered to " conquer all Asia with facility, can you wish for any thing " more"? To this discourse of Aristagoras Cleomenes answered, " Milesian friend, I defer to let you know my resolution till " three days are passed". When that time was come, and they were both met at the appointed place, Cleomenes asked Aristagoras in how many days one might travel from the coast of Ionia to the place where the king was. But though Aristagoras was in other things a man of art, and much superior in ability to Cleomenes, yet he made a slip in this. For, designing to draw the Spartans into Asia, he ought to have abated something of the account: Whereas he told him plainly 'twas a journey of three months: Which Cleomenes, no sooner heard, than interrupting him from proceeding in his discourse concerning the way, he said, " Milesian guest, depart out of Sparta be- " fore the setting of the sun: For you have proposed nothing " to the advantage of the Spartans in advising us to take a " march into Asia, not to be performed in less than three months " after our landing". When he had spoken these words he withdrew; and Aristagoras, taking an olive branch in his hand, after the manner of a suppliant, went after Cleomenes, beseeching him to hear; and at the same time desired him to send away his little daughter Gorgo, who was then with him, being the only child he had, and about eight or nine years of age. But Cleomenes bid him say what he would, and not refrain for the sake of a child. So Aristagoras began with the promise of ten talents, in case Cleomenes would do as he desired; and receiving a denial, proceeded gradually in his offers, till he came to the sum of fifty talents; and then the girl cried, " Father this " stranger will corrupt you unless you go away presently". Cleomenes poſture in which Leonidas and his troops were; this ſpy reported, that they found them exerciſing themſelves in their uſual games, and that they were putting garlands on their heads, as if they were about to celebrate ſome feſtival; the Perſian thereupon aſked Damaratus the meaning of it, Theſe men, Sir, ſaid he, have devoted themſelves to death for the ſervice of their country; at which Xerxes laughed, conceiving that he mightily over-rated the courage of his countrymen, whom himſelf doubted not to fright away with the very appearance of his army; but the event proved the contrary, though there were ſome among the confederates who were not a little terrified at the thoughts of an engagement. Theſe repreſented to Leonidas, that a diſcharge of the Perſian arrows would take away the light of the ſun; Very well, replied he, then we ſhall fight in the ſhade. When they approached, the ſame perſons came to him again; The Perſians, Sir, ſaid they, draw near; What of that ſaid he, Shall not we then be near them? When Xerxes ſaw that he was miſtaken, and that Leonidas really intended to fight, he wrote him a letter, wherein he told him, that the great ſuperiority

Cleomenes, pleaſed with the admonition of the child, retired to another apartment: And Ariſtagoras was conſtrained to depart immediately from Sparta without obtaining leave to inform him farther concerning the way to the place of the king's reſidence (28). When the ſame young lady ſaw Ariſtagoras ſuffer his man to put on his ſhoes, ſhe cried out in amazement, Father! Father! ſee this ſtranger, has he no hands? At another time when a ſoft and delicate ſtranger was about to have paid his compliments to her, ſhe put him away with her hand, adding, Stand by, poor creature; thou haſt not as much of a man in thee as a woman (29). As the laſt and moſt noble commendation recorded of her, let us remark, that Damaratus, though ſhe was the daughter of his deadly enemy, truſted her rather than any of the Greeks with the intelligence he ſent concerning the motion of the Barbarians; or, if we take this as Herodotus does, it may be placed in a ſtronger light; for he ſays, that a ſlave from Damaratus brought a waxen tablet to Sparta with nothing written on it, and when the Spartans knew not what to make of this, Gorgo immediately bid them ſcrape off the wax, whereupon they found Damaratus's letter cut on the wood underneath (30).

(28) Herodot. lib. vi. (29) Plut. in Apophtheg. Mulier. Lacon. (30) Herodot. lib. vi.

of his army might excuſe his not oppoſing him, and that, if he would embrace his intereſt, he ſhould be lord of all Greece. To which Leonidas with great moderation anſwered, If you know wherein the happineſs of life conſiſted, you would not covet what belongs to others; for my part, I had rather die for the liberty of Greece, than command over it. Xerxes then ordered the Medes, who led the van in his army, to fall upon the Greeks, which they did with very great reſolution, but were notwithſtanding repulſed with prodigious ſlaughter; he then commanded a choice corps of Perſians to diſlodge them, but it was in vain; the Greeks were not only ſuperior in valour, but they better underſtood the art of war; they had alſo great advantage from the ſituation of the place, ſo that, after numbers were ſlain, the Perſians were conſtrained to retreat[y]. Xerxes now began to be in pain for his whole army, and with reaſon; for the dead bodies having ſtreightened the paſſages ſtill more, it ſeemed doubtful whether the weight of numbers would force the paſs or no. At length one Ephialtes a Trachinian offered to ſhew them a path round the mountain, whereby they might fall upon the Grecians in the rear; Xerxes thereupon detached Hydarnes with a great body of choſen troops, with directions to follow Ephialtes; they paſſed the river Aſopus in the night, and, having forced the Phocian guard, advanced apace towards Leonidas and his troops; that great commander, who is ſaid to have been informed that the ſenate had received an oracle, purporting, that either one of their kings, or the city itſelf muſt fall, as ſoon as he was informed of what happened, gave leave to all the confederates to withdraw, that they might reſerve themſelves, as he phraſed it, for better times, excepting only the Theſpians and the Thebans, who with his Spartans made in all not above fourteen hundred men; with theſe he propoſed not to wait the attack of the Perſians, but to go and find them out, yet looking on his Spartans, and obſerving ſome ſtripplings who had ſcarce attained the age of men, his heart relented; calling them therefore to him one by one, he pretended to ſend by each of them a billet to the ephori; he would have afterwards done the ſame thing in favour of ſome perſons of extraordinary merit; but

[y] Herodot. lib. viii. Diodor. Sicul. lib. xi. Pauſan. Lacon. Plut. Apoph. Lacon. Juſtin. lib. ii.

but they, penetrating his deſign, refuſed to obey him, one of them anſwering, Sir, I came to ſerve you as a ſoldier, not as a courier. Another, Let us fight, Sir, and then I'll carry your account of the battle. Having made the proper diſpoſitions he paſſed the ſtreights and fell upon the enemy; he and all his Spartans were ſlain together with the Theſpians, but the Thebans holding up their targets cried out for quarter, which was given only to a few, and they were ſtigmatized. This victory, if we muſt call it ſo, coſt the Perſians twenty thouſand men. The body of Leonidas being found, Xerxes ordered it to be nailed to a croſs, an action which reflected diſhonour upon himſelf, and could do no hurt to a dead body; as to the fame of Leonidas, it was out of the reach of Xerxes, and hath remained ſtill freſh three thouſand years after his deceaſe (H). The Perſian after

(H) The action at Thermopylæ makes ſo great a figure in hiſtory, and ſo juſtly, at the ſame time that it ſo nearly concerns the Lacedæmonian hiſtory, that it would be unpardonable in us not to give ſuch particulars thereof as may ſerve to ſet it in the cleareſt light, and do honour to that nation of whoſe affairs we are treating. In the firſt place let us remark, that Leonidas acted all along with great equality of mind, a philoſophic courage, and the true ſpirit of a patriot. He went in the common cauſe of Greece to give a check to the Perſians at their firſt entrance, that thereby the numerous army of Xerxes might receive a taſte of the oppoſition it was to meet with, and the king, if he were not headſtrong and irreprehenſible, have an opportunity given him of retiring in time before multitudes of his men were cut off, and the ſtrength of Aſia waſted to no purpoſe. In fighting at Thermopylæ Leonidas made uſe at firſt of all the advantages of ground, afforded him by his own ſituation and that of the enemy. He drew up his troops in the narroweſt part of the paſſage, and when he retired from the field of battle he diſpoſed his battalions in ſuch a manner that they readily wheeled about and received the enemy, who attempted to harraſs them, in ſuch a manner that there were more ſlain in the retreat than in the fight; if Ephialtes had not led the Barbarians round the mountains, Leonidas would have carried his firſt point, that is, he would have conſtrained Xerxes to retire (31). But when the augur Megiſtias, upon inſpecting the ſacrifices, declared, that all the Grecians were threatned with death; and when this declaration was backed by intelligence that the enemy was actually paſſing

(31) Polyæn. Strateg. lib. i. c. 32. lib. vii. c. 15.

after this conſulted Damaratus again, adjuring him by the kindneſs he had ſhewn him to give his ſentiments ſincerely paſſing the mountains. Leonidas put in practice his ſecond reſolution, which was the devoting of his Spartans and himſelf to death for the ſafety of Greece in general, and of Sparta in particular (32). This reſolution was founded upon two reaſons; the firſt, that the ſtreights of Thermopylæ ought not abſolutely to be abandoned, but ſold to the enemy as dear as might be; the ſecond reſted upon this oracle which the Lacedæmonians had received.

Thy plains, O Sparta, Perſian rage ſhall feel,
Thy ſons ſhall ſlaughter'd fall by foreign ſteel,
Unleſs a king of the Herculean race,
In war, to ſave the reſt, ſhall death embrace.

This prompted Leonidas to receive that death, which he knew muſt ſome time or other happen him, when it might avert evil from his country; it was to prevent an unneceſſary carnage, that Leonidas diſmiſſed the greateſt part of his allies, and retained with him only fourteen hundred men, viz. three hundred Spartans, ſeven hundred Theſpians, and four hundred Thebans; he then advanced without the narrow paſſage, becauſe he no longer thought of defending his own party, but how he might moſt injure the enemy; and in that deſperate attack he fell. Xerxes loſt two brothers in this engagement, and an incredible number of troops. On the field of battle there were three monuments raiſed, one to perpetuate the memory of ſuch of the troops as were ſlain before the confederates were diſmiſſed, with this inſcription:

Four thouſand here, from various nations brought,
For Greece againſt the Medes three millions fought.

The ſecond was for the Lacedæmonians only, with this diſtich upon it:

Go, friend, and to our brother Spartans tell,
With what applauſe we in their ſervice fell.

The third was for the augur Megiſtias, who, though preſſed by Leonidas to retire, refuſed, contenting himſelf with ſending away his only ſon:

Divine Megiſtias lies beneath this ſtone,
Who met without concern ill fortune's frown;
Nor would to ſave his life conſent to fly,
When the brave Spartans had reſolv'd to die.

(32) Juſtin. lib. ii. c. 11.

It

ſincerely as to the method in which it was proper to carry on the war. The Spartan thereupon propoſed to him ſeizing the iſle of Cythera, which lay over againſt Laconia, and from whence he might have made the Spartans ſo uneaſy as would infallibly hinder their ſending aſſiſtance to the Athenians, or impeding him in his deſign of penetrating into Greece; but Achœmenes the king's brother being quite of a different opinion, fearing that if the fleet parted from the land-army both might be ruined, Xerxes preferred his counſel, and thereby failed in his deſign [z]. The Grecian fleet in the mean time lay at Artemiſium under the command of Eurybiades a Spartan, a man of great perſonal courage, but timorous as a commander, and unexperienced in ſea affairs. The Perſians, hoping to ſurprize and ſurround them, detached two hundred ſhips with orders to ſail round Eubœa, and fall on the rear of the Grecian navy; but this being betrayed to the Greeks, they weighed anchor in the night, and ſtood directly to ſea to meet theſe two hundred ſail, ſo that inſtead of ſurprizing others, they were themſelves ſurprized; thirty of them ſunk, and the reſt forced to betake themſelves to flight, wherein they were no leſs unfortunate; for a ſtorm ariſing, moſt of them were ſhipwrecked on the coaſt. The Grecian fleet ſome-time after ſailed to the coaſt of Attica, and at the deſire of the Athenians anchored near Salamis. Eurybiades had ſtill the command, though of three hundred and fifty-eight ſhips, of [z] Herodot. ubi ſupra. Pauſan. ubi ſupra. Plut. ubi ſupra, & in vit. Themiſt.

It is alledged, that Eurytus and Ariſtodemus, two of the three hundred Spartans being ill of ſore eyes, retired to Alpeni with the permiſſion of Leonidas, and were there in the time of the laſt battle, on the news of which Eurytus cauſed his armour to be put on, and ordered his ſervant to conduct him directly to the field, where running, blind as he was, into the midſt of the enemy, he was ſuddenly covered with wounds, and fell down dead; but Ariſtodemus returned to Sparta, where he met with a very indifferent reception, being treated as a man who had not courage enough to die with his companions; to aggravate their ill uſage, they ſirnamed him the Fugitive; he redeemed his credit, however, at the battle of Platæa, where, having devoted himſelf to death, he performed ſuch actions as are ſcarce credible (33).

(33) Herodot. lib. vii. Diodor. Sicul. lib. xi. Plut. in Apophtheg. Lacon. & in vit. Ariſtid.

of which the fleet consisted, a hundred and eighty belonged to the Athenians. As to the battle which happened there not long after, we have already given a full account of it in our Athenian history, and therefore shall not trouble the reader with needless repetitions here [a]. The first step that was taken afterwards, was, to prepare a great fleet to prosecute the victory, the command of which was given to Leotychides king of Sparta; but it soon after appeared, that the Persians had not totally abandoned their design, Mardonius remaining in Greece at the head of a considerable army, with which he threatened in the spring to revisit Attica; the Greeks therefore found themselves under a necessity of raising a land-army also.

Mardonius attempts the conquest of Greece.

PAUSANIAS the son of Cleombrotus took upon him the character of tutor or protector to Plistarchus the son of Leonidas, and in right thereof was the first magistrate in Sparta, the other king, as we have said, being absent, having the command of the confederate fleet. In this situation of things, the dilatoriness of popular councils eminently appeared, for when the army ought to have been in the field, the Athenian embassadors found the Lacedæmonians celebrating the Hyacinthia; in vain these ministers represented, that the common cause was neglected, and that the Athenians had reason to expect better things, since they had hazarded all for the service of Greece; the ephori and senate, confiding mightily in the strong wall which by this time was erected cross the isthmus, thought but little of raising troops, till Chileus a Tegeatæan, who had a great reputation amongst them, shewed them how foolish and dishonourable this conduct of theirs was, since it was plain, if the Athenians were ruined through their delay, that the Persians, being masters at sea, might land what forces they would in Laconia, and bring the war home to their doors, the wall cross the isthmus being in such a case useless [b]. Roused by this representation, they sent five thousand Spartans, and, which was an unusual thing with them, gave arms to seven thousand of their Helotes, Pausanias commanding in chief. This, however, did not hinder Mardonius from taking Athens, or from seeking the Greek army and offering battle. Pausanias had the command in chief of the whole Grecian forces, which were not less than one hundred thousand men. The Persians were certainly double their number, nay, according to Diodorus's account count, Mardonius's army conſiſted of five hundred thouſand men. When they came into the neighbourhood of Platæa, an engagement happened between a great body of Perſian horſe, commanded by Maſiſtius, and a corps of Greeks, wherein, after a great effuſion of blood, the Perſians were routed and their commander killed [c]. A general battle being delayed, the Greek army ſuffered much by deſertion, as on the other hand did the Perſians for want of proviſions. Pauſanias at length thought fit to decamp, that he might procure his army freſh and more advantageous quarters, in which, however, he was oppoſed by Amompharetus an old Spartan commander, who inſiſted, that it was derogatory to the Spartan honour to retire in ſight of an enemy. Pauſanias, like a wiſe man and a great captain, anſwered, That marching this way or that was not diſhonourable, when it proceeded from a right motive; but when he found all his entreaties were in vain, and that Amompharetus would not be perſuaded, he gave the ſignal, and immediately the Lacedæmonian and Tegeatæan foot began to move. Amompharetus, who was hitherto of opinion that Pauſanias would not deſert him, when he ſaw him actually on his march, ordered his ſtandards to be taken up and moved ſlowly after him. Pauſanias kept the high ground, the Athenians, who very exactly obeyed his orders, marched in the plain; the reſt of the confederates withdrew to the temple of Juno, where they were out of reach of the Perſian cavalry. At the temple of Ceres, which was on the brow of the hill, Pauſanias halted with all his forces to give Amompharetus and his battalion time to come up; but they had hardly rejoined the army before the van-guard of the Perſian horſe attacked them with great vigour [d]. Mardonius looked upon this decampment of the Greek troops in the ſame light that Amompharetus did, that is, as a plain flight, and therefore was eager not to fight them, but to fall upon the runaways; this eagerneſs, as far as we can judge at this diſtance of time, ſeems to have been the chief cauſe of his misfortune: for his Perſians marching haſtily and without order, the reſt of the corps of which his numerous army was compoſed did the like, which gave the Greeks great advantage. The troops under Pauſanias did not

[a] See before, Vol. vi. p. 356. [b] Herodot. lib. viii. Diodor. Sicul. lib. xi. Pausan. in Lacon.

[c] Herod. lib. ix. Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra. Pauſan. ubi ſupra.
[d] Herodot. lib. ix. Plut. in. vit. Themiſt. & Ariſt. Diod. Sicul. lib. xi. Juſtin. lib. ii. c. 14. Corn. Nepos, in vit. Pauſan.

not much exceed 50,000 men, and on this account it was that he sent to hasten the Athenians in their march. The Athenians who on this occasion acted with the utmost generosity, endeavoured, as well as they were able, to fulfil his orders; but were unluckily stopped short by the Bœotians and other Greeks in the service of the Persian, who on this occasion behaved with amazing courage and intrepidity. The Lacedæmonians and Tegeatæans were forced to engage Mardonius's army without assistance. It is universally acknowledged, that the Persians behaved very well on this occasion; but, being neither so well armed nor so well disciplined as the Greeks, their valour was of no use but to bring them to slaughter; for, as Herodotus rightly observes, it was all the same, whether one or ten Persians broke into the Grecian ranks, since the next line was ready to receive them without confusion or disorder, so that they were presently slain without effecting any thing, because they charged tumultuously; their commanders having no capacity to direct them, nor they to obey. Their number and their courage, however, kept the battle doubtful as long as Mardonius lived, who, mounted on a white horse, and fighting at the head of a thousand men, gave signal demonstrations of a courage deserving a better fate; but when he was slain, the Persians began to break and to give way, which dispirited all the barbarous nations, who now followed the example of their flight, though they had not drawn their swords. The Athenians also defeated the Greeks who sided with and fought for the Persians, so that Artabazus, who was next in command to Mardonius, and against whose advice these measures were taken, judging all to be lost, retired with forty thousand, and, marched with all the expedition he was able back to Thrace; the rest of the Persian army withdrew as speedily as they could into their camp, where they strengthened the works formerly thrown up, and resolved to defend to the utmost of their power these posts against the victorious Greeks. Pausanias, coming up with his Lacedæmonians, attacked the camp without hesitation, but at the same time with little success; for the Persians, fighting now not for victory or glory, but for their lives, made a most obstinate resistance; besides, they had the same advantage over the Lacedæmonians here, which the Lacedæmonians had over them in the field; for, as we have heretofore observed, the Spartans were unaccustomed to such attacks, avoiding, in obedience to the laws of Lycurgus, all sieges

as

as much as in them lay; yet this ſtate of things laſted but for a ſmall time; for when the Athenians came up, who of all the Greeks beſt underſtood the art of defending or attacking fortifications, they quickly opened a paſſage to the Lacedæmonians, and when that was once done, a mercileſs ſlaughter enſued, ſince of three hundred thouſand men, whom Mardonius brought into the field, ſcarce three thouſand eſcaped [e]; of the Greeks, however, it is uncertain how many there fell; if we believe Herodotus, there died of the Spartans ninety-one; of the Tegeatæans ſixteen; and of the Athenians fifty-two [f]. Plutarch owns one thouſand three hundred and ſixty to have fallen [g]; but Diodorus Siculus is poſitive, that there were very few leſs than ten thouſand [h]. When this bloody engagement was over, the reſt of the allies came up to be witneſſes rather than aſſiſtants in gaining the victory, by which behaviour they drew on themſelves contempt and ſcorn. Lampon of Ægina propoſed to Pauſanias, that the body of Mardonius ſhould be carefully ſearched for, that the indignity offered to his uncle Leonidas by the command of Xerxes might be revenged thereon. To which Pauſanias anſwered, "Friend "of Ægina, I very kindly accept of your good intention, "and the reſpect you expreſs for me and my family; but "I cannot help telling you, that your zeal hath drawn "you to make a very wrong judgment of this matter; "for whereas you have highly magnified my actions, the "courage of my countrymen, and the action we have this "day atchieved, you throw all this down again by impor-"tuning me to inſult the dead, and perſuading me that I "ſhall heighten my glory, if I do that which is fitter for "Barbarians to do, nay, which we have not ſpared to re-"proach even in them; I cannot therefore aſſent to theſe "notions of the men of Ægina, nor to thoſe of any other "nation, who delight in ſuch actions, being content to "be commended by the Spartans, for neither doing, nor "ſpeaking an unbecoming thing. As for Leonidas, whoſe "death you would have revenged, I am of opinion, that "the innumerable multitude we have ſlain have ſufficient-"ly repaired the loſs of him and thoſe that fell with him "at Thermopylæ. Come no more therefore to me with "ſuch diſcourſes; offer me no more ſuch counſels, but "look upon it as a very great favour that you have eſcaped "even now unpuniſhed." When this great captain beheld the [e] Herodot. ubi ſupra. [f] ubi ſupra. [g] ubi ſupra. [h] ubi ſupra.

the magnificent tent and rich furniture belonging to Mardonius, with the mighty magazines of luxury belonging thereto, he gave orders to the cooks and bakers to prepare him such a supper as they were wont to do for that general; which when they had done, he ordered some of his own servants to dress a Spartan meal; which being also done, he sent for the principal officers among the Greeks; thus pointing to both the suppers, he said with a smile, See, gentlemen, the folly of this king of the Medes, who, living in this sumptuous manner at home, would needs come so far to spoil us who fare sohardly. Part of the prodigious spoils that were taken in the Persian camp, the Helotes, who were entrusted to collect them, purloined; part were dedicated to the gods, a tenth of all sorts was given to Pausanias, and the rest distributed among the Greeks. Having thus put an end to the war, Pausanias thought next of punishing such as had betrayed the common cause of Greece; with this view he marched immediately to Thebes, the citizens of which at first attempted to make a defence, but on mature deliberation they capitulated, and delivered up the chiefs of the Median faction which were in their hands; they vainly fancied, that they might redeem themselves with money, but in this they were greatly mistaken; for Pausanias, disdaining their proposal, hurried them away to Corinth, and caused them there to be put to death [i].

The Greeks victorious at Mycale.

THE same day that the battle of Platæa was fought, Leotychides king of Sparta, with Xanthippus the Athenian, gained a glorious victory at Mycale, where the last remains of the Persian fleet and of the Persian armies, which had been drawn together for the destruction of Greece, were utterly defeated; the commanders of the Persian fleet greatly discouraged their men by the pusillanimity of their conduct; for notwithstanding they had a great number of ships, they ran them all on shore, and sought to shelter themselves under the protection of an army of sixty thousand men, which under the command of Tigranes had been left to defend Ionia. The Greeks seeing this determined to attack them on shore, and Leotychides, standing in towards the coasts, ordered a herald to make proclamation, when he drew near enough to be heard, in the Greek tongue, in these words: "Men of Ionia, such among you as my "voice reaches hearken with attention to what I say, "the

[i] Herodot. ubi supra. Plut. ubi supra. Corn. Nepos, ubi supra.

" the rather becauſe the Perſians cannot underſtand me;
" when the battle begins, every one of you ought in the
" firſt place to remember liberty, and in the next, that " the word in our army is Hebe; let ſuch as hear me in" form thoſe who hear me not." This proclamation had a double effect, for it inclined many of the Ionians to favour the Greeks, and it ſo frighted the Perſians, that they knew not whom to truſt (I). The Perſians, before the

(I) Herodotus is no mighty admirer of Leotychides king of Sparta, for he expreſly gives the preference to the Athenians, after them to the Corinthians, the Trœzenians, and the Sicyonians (34); yet the truth ſeems to be, that Leotychides behaved with great prudence upon this occaſion, as we have ſaid above in the text; and there is one inſtance of his abilities as a general, which has been little taken notice of, and which it is our duty therefore particularly to mention here: He it was who contrived that miracle, as ſome called it, of the victory won at Platæa, not in conſequence of any intelligence, for that was impoſſible, but believing it the beſt way to incline the Ionians to favour the Greeks; he induſtriouſly ſpread the pretended news, and at the ſame time openly invited the Ionians to throw off the yoke, and aſſert their freedom; whence, as is evident from the account in the text, this victory in a great meaſure proceeded (35). This conduct of his is very reconcileable to one of his ſayings recorded by Plutarch: A Spartan in good circumſtances aſked one day this prince, How he might beſt preſerve his happineſs? Leotychides anſwered, By not truſting all to fortune (36). It is certain, that Leotychides was not a very adventurous admiral, but abſolutely refuſed to accompany Xanthippus when he found the bridges removed which Xerxes had thrown croſs the Helleſpont; but this may be eaſily accounted for, without derogating at all from the courage and military capacity of the king of Sparta; the Athenians, by nature and by the conſtitution of their ſtate, were inclined to maritime affairs, and enabled to obtain the empire of the ſea, of which as yet Sparta had little ambition, though ſhe poſſeſſed it; for, as Herodotus plainly ſays, the command was given her by the allies, who refuſed to follow any other than a Spartan admiral (37). Leotychides therefore did all in his power to ſerve the common cauſe, while the united fleet continued together

(34) Herodot. Hiſt. lib. ix. (35) Polyæn. Strategem. lib. i. c. 33. lib. viii. c. 45. Frontin. Strategem. lib. i. c 2. (36) Plutarch. Apophtheg. Lacon. (37) Herodot. lib. vii.

the battle began, disarmed the Samians, having some intelligence that they had been intriguing with the Greeks; but confiding greatly in the Milesians, they entrusted them with the custody of the passages through the mountains behind them; these dispositions made, they prepared to defend their fortifications the best they could; yet neither their conduct nor their valour availed much, for the Greeks landing, the Athenians marched strait forward along the shore, the Lacedæmonians took a compass by the hills. The former after an obstinate resistance forced the Persian camp, about the same time that the latter attacked them in the rear; the Samians, in the midst of the battle catching up whatever came to hand, fell upon the Persians in their very camp, and the Milesians, who were to have guarded the passes, as soon as the Persians fled, fell upon them, and either killed them, or made them prisoners [k]. A very odd circumstance, which according to the superstition of those times passed for miraculous, contributed much to the gaining of this victory; it was this; about the time the battle began a rumour was spread throughout the army, that the Barbarians were beaten at Platæa, though, as we have observed, that engagement happened in the morning of that day in the evening of which this happened at Mycale; but of this strange business, which some modern writers have treated very obscurely, the reader hath received a satisfactory account in the note I [l].

Pausanias intrigues with Artabazus. Year after the Flood, 2508. Year before Christ, 491.

PAUSANIAS was afterwards sent to take the command of the fleet, with strict orders to free the Grecian cities from the Persian garrisons; on this design he sailed with a great fleet to Cyprus, thence to Byzantium, which according to his instructions he set at liberty, and this seems to have been the last of his exploits; for immediately upon this he fell into a scandalous treaty with the Persians, affecting by the assistance of the great king to make himself sovereign of Greece; that at this time he first entered into these practices gether in the Hellespont; but when slight descents were proposed, and the pillaging of the enemy's coasts and ships, he whose particular squadron was of no strength, did not think fit to remain long at sea, because in all probability he conceived, that nothing could be further done worthy of the Spartan name and glory.

[k] Herodot.

[l] Wanley's History of Man. Beauchamp's Essays, c. 1. sect. vi.

tices appears from hence, he ſent ſuch Perſians of great quality as he took in Byzantium to Gongylus of Eretria, telling the Grecian chiefs that he reſerved them for puniſhment, whereas he had privately given directions that they ſhould be ſent back in ſafety to Xerxes[m]. As ſoon as he had conceived theſe ſtrange notions in his head, he fell into the manners of the Perſians, affected all their luxury, and derided the plain cuſtoms of his country, of which he had formerly been ſo fond. Another action happened at Byzantium extreamly prejudicial to his character, and which ſome ſay diſturbed him to his death; he fell violently in love with a young lady named Cleonice, whom her parents, fearing to deny him, forced to take part of his bed; but ſhe in great modeſty deſiring that the lights might be put out, when ſhe came into his chamber, unfortunately ſtumbled on an extinguiſhed lamp, whereupon he, awakening, and fearing that ſome aſſaſſin had broke into his room, catched up his ſword and mortally wounded her. His affliction for this accident put him almoſt beſide himſelf [n]; the allies in the mean time took great umbrage at his conduct, and privately ſent to accuſe him at Sparta; in the interim they deprived him of his command, and even beſieged him in Byzantium [o]; eſcaping, however, from thence, he fled to Heraclea, where he endeavoured, according to the methods then in uſe, to pacify the ghoſt of Cleonice. In this place he met with certain perſons who had, or pretended to have, the power of raiſing the ſpirits of perſons deceaſed, and who at his entreaty brought up that of his miſtreſs, who to all his queſtions gave him this ſhort anſwer: When you come to Sparta, you will find an end to all your misfortunes [p]. Accordingly when he came home, the ephori cauſed him to be ſeized; but having no ſufficient evidence, and not caring in all probability to proceed with rigour againſt ſo eminent a perſon on bare ſuſpicions, he was for a time enlarged. Theſe warnings did not deter him from carrying on the projects he had formed. Artabazus was the perſon he negotiated with, and between them they fixed this rule; that whoever brought any of Pauſanias's epiſtles ſhould immediately be put to death, that there might be no poſſibility of producing witneſſes againſt him [q]. But growing impatient, and finding that Themiſtocles, notwithſtanding the injuries done him by the Athenians, would not enter into his meaſures, Pauſanias wrote in peremptory terms to Artabazus, and confided his letters to Argilius his particular favourite, and as ſome ſay, catamite. This man, conſidering with himſelf that none of Pauſanias's meſſengers were come back again, determined to open his letters, and finding by their contents that he was to have met with no better treatment than his predeceſſors, he carried them directly to the ephori, who diſcovered much from them, but yet not enough to convict Pauſanias; but Argilius ſoon helped this out, for retiring to Tænarus, and pretending there to pay his devotions to Neptune, he ſet up a double tent; in one part of which he concealed certain Spartans, and in the other he entertained Pauſanias, who came to expoſtulate with him for not carrying his letters; by theſe expoſtulations, thoſe who overheard them became direct witneſſes againſt him, ſo that, at his return to Sparta, the ephori determined to impriſon him, of which having ſome intelligence, he retired to the temple of Minerva Chalcidica, and there took ſanctuary, which gave occaſion to one of the moſt extraordinary proceedings any where recorded in hiſtory; for the Lacedæmonians, not caring to invade the ſanctuary, were at a loſs what to do, till the mother of Pauſanias taking a tile in her hand came to the temple, and laid it down at the door, after which, without ſpeaking a word, ſhe retired to her own houſe; the Spartans, having conſidered her conduct, following her example blocked up the gate, and, thus preventing his going out, reduced him to the neceſſity of ſtarving in the temple. When they were ſure he was dead, they opened the gate again, and taking out his body delivered it to his relations[r]. About this time Leotychides, being ſent with a great army to chaſtiſe the Theſſalians, who had ſhewn themſelves no friends to Greece in general, and expreſſed a particular enmity towards Sparta, inſtead of doing his duty, after he had obtained a victory and reduced the enemy into very bad circumſtances, began to receive bribes, and informations being thereupon given in againſt him, he was ſurprized in his tent with money in both hands. Returning to Sparta, and finding that his citizens were in no humour to diſpenſe with with his infidelity, he to avoid their fury fled to Tegea, and died there in exile, having ſurvived his ſon Zeuxidamus, in whom he placed all his hopes [s].

[m] Diodor. Sicul. lib. xi. Corn. Nepos, in vit. Pauſan. [n] Plut. in vit. Cymonis. Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra. Corn. Nepos. in vit. Pauſan. [o] Plut. in vit. Cimonis. [q] Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra. Juſtin. lib. ii. c. 15.

[r] Plut. in Parallel. x. in vit. Themiſt. in Apophth. Mulier. Lacon. Thucyd. lib. i. Corn. Nepos, in vit. Pauſan. Polyæn. Strategem. lib. viii. 51. Diodor. ubi ſupra. Juſtin. ubi ſupra.

PLISTARCHUS the ſon of Leonidas, to whom Pauſanias was tutor did not live long; he was ſucceeded by Pliſtoanax the ſon of Pauſanias, the next legal heir of the royal family, as Leotychides was by his grandſon Archidamus; as for Pliſtoanax, he was a prince of a very mild and peaceable diſpoſition, one who gave no umbrage to his fellow-citizens, and who, in their quarrels with the Athenians, acted according to their directions, and did not endeavour to embroil them, that he might make himſelf the more neceſſary to them [t]. Archidamus was of a like diſpoſition, and it may be truly ſaid, that under the reigns of theſe princes the Spartans felt no miſchiefs but what they brought upon themſelves, and had no good luck but what was derived to them from their kings and their family; for in the nonage of Pliſtoanax Nicomedes the ſon of Cleombrotus acted as his tutor. At the end of the LXXVIIth olympiad a moſt dreadful earthquake happened at Sparta: Diodorus ſays, that twenty thouſand perſons loſt their lives, and Plutarch affirms, that only five houſes in the city eſcaped ruin; in the midſt of this general confuſion, Archidamus gave ſuch an inſtance of his wiſdom and firmneſs, as muſt render him everlaſtingly admired; conſidering with himſelf that his citizens were of far greater value than even their moſt valuable effects, and yet ſeeing that to ſave theſe they were ready to riſque themſelves, he cauſed an alarm to be ſounded, as if an enemy had been juſt at hand, wherupon in haſte they armed themſelves and repaired into the field, which wrought them double ſafety; for the Helotes, now conceiving that they had a fit time to be revenged of their cruel maſters, unanimouſly took up arms, and marched boldly to Sparta, expecting they ſhould find none to withſtand them; but they were greatly miſtaken, for Archidamus, with his citizens compleatly armed, made ſuch a ſtand, that they were conſtrained to retire. However, knowing they could now expect no favour from their lords, whom they had ſo ill treated in the time of their diſtreſs, they determined with themſelves to perſiſt in their revolt, and to truſt for a pacification to their ſwords, rather than to their entreaties [u]. Many reaſons contributed to ſtrengthen the Helotes in this determination; the Spartans were already embroiled with the Athenians, who were inclined to diſpute with them the ſovereignty of Greece; the Meſſenians began to ſhew evident marks of their reſentment of the indignities and oppreſſions which were thrown upon them; the reſt of the Peloponneſian ſtates were not a little diſſatisfied, ſo that never were the Lacedæmonians leſs able to act vigorouſly againſt their rebellious ſubjects than at preſent. The firſt ſtep they took, after throwing off the yoke, was ſeizing a port in Meſſenia, from whence they made continual inroads into Laconia, burning and pillaging all the villages they came to; the Spartans in this diſtreſs applied themſelves to Athens for aſſiſtance, which after ſome oppoſition was granted them, and ſent under the command of Cimon the ſon of Miltiades; they likewiſe ſollicited their other allies, who, ſeeing the readineſs of the Athenians, and conſidering the great ſervices which all Greece had received from Sparta, likewiſe ſent their quotas, which enabled Archidamus to take the field, notwithſtanding the Meſſenians had joined with the Helotes and fortified Ithome [x]. It is not very clear, whether there happened any general battle or not; but however it was, the Helotes and Meſſenians thought it better to retire to Ithome, than to abide the Spartan army in the field, whereby the latter, much againſt their wills, were conſtrained to make the ſiege of this city; for, as we have more than once obſerved, this was a part of the military ſcience, in which the Lacedæmonians were but indifferently ſkilled; it was chiefly on this account that they beſought the aid of the Athenians, and yet, when their troops came before the city, and behaved themſelves more actively than the Spartans themſelves, they grew jealous of them, and being fearful leſt the ſtrangers in their army might be corrupted, and, being countenanced by the Athenians, go over to the enemy; they diſmiſſed the latter, telling them they had no farther occaſion for their ſervice, which exceedingly incenſed the people of Athens, and made them more ready to think of any method to reduce the Spartan greatneſs, than hitherto they had been [y]. While things were in this ſituation, the Phocians made war upon the Dorians who inhabited mount Parnaſſus, and took from them ſeveral cities, and amongſt the reſt their capital. Theſe Dorians being originally Lacedæmonians, the Spartans diſpatched diſpatched an army under the command of Nicomedes; he quickly reduced the Phocians to reaſon, and ſet all things right; but returning with his army, the Athenians, joining the Argives and Theſſalians, ſhut up the paſſages into Peloponneſus: Nicomedes upon this retired towards Tanagra in Bœotia, whither the Athenians followed him, and forced him to an engagement, wherein, the Theſſalians deſerting them, they had much the worſt [z]; the next year the Lacedæmonians aſſiſted the Thebans againſt the Athenians, but were therein ſo unfortunate as to be totally routed at Tanagra with great loſs. The Meſſenian war was ſtill carried on, and was not like to be terminated even in the tenth year, Ithome being naturally a ſtrong place, and the oracle at Delphi having threatened the Spartans, if they injured the ſuppliants of Jupiter Ithome, wherefore they were forced to turn their ſiege into a blockade, and at laſt hearkened to terms of accommodation, whereby it was agreed, that the Meſſenians ſhould depart Peloponneſus, never to return, on pain of becoming ſlaves if they did [a]; theſe poor people were thereupon received with their wives and children by the Athenians, rather out of ſpleen to Sparta, than any great deſire to render ſervice to the diſtreſſed. They granted them Naupactus for their reſidence, from whence they afterwards brought them to inhabit part of their own country, of which in the courſe of the Peloponneſian war they diſpoſſeſſed the Lacedæmonians [b]. The next war the Lacedæmonians undertook was that ſtiled the ſacred, by ſome the Phocian war; the end of it was to put the temple at Delphi into the hands of the inhabitants of the country, whereas it had before belonged to the Phocians, which the Spartans effected, and for which the Delphians by a decree conferred on the Lacedæmonians a right of firſt conſulting the oracle, which decree they engraved on the forehead of a brazen wolf conſecrated in the temple; the Athenians ſoon after reſtored the temple to the Phocians, and from them obtained the ſame privilege which the Delphians had granted to the Spartans, and this decree they cauſed to be engraven on the right ſide of the wolf; the Lacedæmonians having induced the Bœotians to revolt from the Athenians, and Tolmides, who attempted to reduce them, [z] Diod. ubi ſupra. Thucyd. ubi ſupra. [a] Pauſan. Meſſen.

The reigns of Pliſtarchus, Pliſtoanax, and of Archidamus.

[s] Herod lib. vi. Pauſan. Lacon. [t] Idem ibid. [u] Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra. Pauſan. in Meſſen. Juſtin. ubi ſupra. Plut. in vit. Cimon.

[x] Diodor. Sicul. lib. xi. [y] Plut. in vit. Cimon. Thucyd. lib. i.

[b] Thucyd. lib. iv. [c] Diodor. Sicul. lib. xi. Plut. in vit. Periclis.

being ſlain, and Eubœa at the ſame time revolting, they held this a fit ſeaſon for giving a mortal blow to Athens; for which cauſe Pliſtoanax was ordered to invade the Athenian territories with a great army, with him; being but young, Cleondrides was ſent to direct him, but he proved an unlucky guardian; for, being a lover of money, he accepted a bribe from Pericles, and perſuaded the king to return home without effecting any thing, for which the Spartans puniſhed him with death, and drove their king into baniſhment; not long after, a peace was made between this nation and the Athenians, which though it laſted for ſome time, yet was it far from extinguiſhing that hatred which for ſome time had burnt in the boſoms of both [d]. At firſt the Athenians had the ſtronger party among the Greeks, becauſe the Lacedæmonians had behaved with haughtineſs while they held the ſovereignty; but the Athenians gaining power, and making as bad uſe of it, or worſe, almoſt all Greece, except the ſtates immediately under her juriſdiction, and even ſome of them alſo, hated her, and applied themſelves to the Spartans: In the fourteenth year of the truce, which was to have laſted thirty, a great aſſembly of deputies from the ſtates of Peloponneſus and other parts of Greece was held at Lacedæmon, where they unanimouſly accuſed the Athenians of tyranny, oppreſſion, injuſtice, plundering them of vaſt ſums of money, and in fine of a multitude of other crimes, beſeeching the Lacedæmonians to ſtir in the common cauſe of Greece, and not ſuffer the Athenians to effect what the Perſian king with all his power was not able to perform. Some embaſſadors of Athens, who were by chance in the city, defended the cauſe of their country ſtoutly. The Spartans, however, having heard both parties, were greatly inclined immediately to declare war againſt the Athenians [e]. But Archidamus, like a wiſe and good prince, interpoſed, and adviſed them to weigh well the ſtep they were about to take; he ſhewed them, that, comparing their own ſtate with that of Athens, not only the aid of the Greeks, but of the Barbarians alſo, was neceſſary. He demonſtrated, that the invaſion of Attica would ſignify little, that if they went ſlowly into this buſineſs, the Athenians might probably return to a proper temper, and

[d] Diodor. ubi ſupra. Plut. ubi ſupra. Thucyd. lib. 1. [e] Diodor. Sicul. lib. xi. Plut. in vit. Periclis. Juſtin. lib. iii. c. 7.

and make satisfaction to their allies, that at least they would preserve their own reputation, and would enable themselves to carry on the war with effect. But Sthenelaides, one of the ephori declared himself of a different sentiment; he alledged, that it was a great happiness for Sparta, that other states had taken umbrage at her rival, that if she was not quickly pulled down, their united strength would be too little, and that if they took not this opportunity, they might never have it in their power at all. At his motion therefore war was decreed immediately, after which deputies were sent to consult the oracle at Delphi, whence they received a response suited to their wishes: Embassadors were likewise sent to all the allies to desire them to prepare their quotas, and also to Athens to offer peace upon certain conditions, which at the motion of Pericles were rejected [f].

The commencement of the Peloponnesian war.

The first action of the Peloponnesian war was the attempt made upon Platæa by the Thebans; immediately after this both parties took the field, all the Peloponnesians, except the Argives and Achæans, sided with Sparta; without Peloponnesus the Megareans, Phocians, Locrians, Bœotians, Ambraciots, Leucadians, and Anactorians; the Corinthians, Megareans, Sicyonians, Pellenians, Eleans, Ambraciots, and Leucadians furnished ships, the Bœotians, Phocians, and Locrians sent cavalry, the rest of the states furnished their respective quotas in foot. Archidamus, at the head of a mighty army, marched to the frontiers of Attica, from whence he dispatched a messenger to Athens, being very desirous even to the last of avoiding if possible this war; but the messenger was sent back unheard, and the enemies of Archidamus beginning to insinuate, that, out of friendship to the Athenians, he betrayed the common cause, he marched into Attica, and penetrated within a few miles of Athens itself, destroying the country, and wasting all things in a terrible manner, after which he returned through Bœotia into Peloponnesus [g]; in the mean time the Athenian fleet infested the coast of Laconia, and the troops on board it landing besieged Methone, to the relief of which Brasidas the Spartan hasted with a hundred men, and breaking with much ado through the enemy, got safe into the town, where he made so vigorous a resistance, that the Athenians [f] Thucyd. lib. i. [g] Diodor. Thucyd. Plut. in vit. Periclis.

Athenians were forced to retire; the same year the inhabitants of Ægina, being expelled by the Athenians, fled into Peloponnesus, and had the district of Thyrea assigned them by the Spartans. In the spring of the second year Archidamus entered Attica again, but after remaining there forty days, hearing that Pericles with a great many wasted Peloponnesus, he returned to assist his countrymen, the rather because the plague raged violently in Attica [h]. In the third year Archidamus besieged Platæa, which making an obstinate defence, he was constrained to turn his siege into a blockade. In the fourth year he entered Attica the third time, and wasted all the ripe corn, whereby the Athenians were greatly distressed; the same year the Mitylenians revolted from the Athenians, and in the winter of that year Platæa was reduced to such streights, that part of its garrison forced their way through the Peloponnesian guards, and escaped to Athens; the rest were in the beginning of the next year forced to yield, and were all put to death, the city being razed to the ground, notwithstanding the generous zeal she had expressed in the cause of Greece, in the memorable battle fought on her territories [i]; this year also Archidamus died in a good old age and after a very long reign; he was one of the best kings that Sparta ever had, and this will in some measure appear from the following saying of his; being asked who were governors at Sparta, he answered, The laws and the magistrates according to those laws; he left behind him two sons Agis and Agesilaus, the eldest of which succeeded him [k].

The reign of Agis. Year after the Flood, 2331. BeforeChrist 668.

In the spring after his father's death Agis invaded Attica, and while he was employed there the Athenians seized Pylus, whither he was forced to hasten, but to little purpose, a hundred and twenty of the nobility of Sparta being taken and sent prisoners to Athens; not long after, the Athenians seized the island of Cythera, and filled it with a colony of Messenians, who proved the bitterest enemies, as indeed they might well, to the Lacedæmonians [l]. Thyrea was also taken, and the poor inhabitants of Ægina who had setttled there were massacred. To remove move the war to a greater distance, the Lacedæmonians sent Brasidas their famous general into Thrace, where he effectually answered their expectations, and humbled the pride of the Athenians. When he was about to march with the army, proclamation was made by the command of the ephori, that such of the Helotes as were willing to enlist themselves as volunteers should be manumitted; which proposition being joyfully accepted by two thousand of them, they were accordingly set at liberty, but their liberty consisted only in being shewn a short road into another world; for they having pointed out to their jealous masters, who amongst them were most warlike, they were immediately dispatched privately, and seven hundred of the stoutest of the remaining Helotes were, together with a thousand mercenary Peloponnesians, sent with Brasidas [m]. Thucydides the historian commanded the Athenian forces at that time in Thrace, and performed there whatever could be expected from a wise man and an experienced commander; but the fortune of Brasidas, the valour of his forces, and the pronenes of the people of the country to side with him against the Athenians, gave such high advantages to the Lacedæmonians and their allies, that Amphipolis and several other cities were taken. The use made of this at Sparta was to set new negotiations on foot, partly because the war was very burthensome, and partly because Brasidas was greatly envied. With much ado a truce was concluded for a year, at the end of which Brasidas fell upon Cleon, who commanded the Athenian forces in the neighbourhood of Amphipolis, and gained a great victory, Cleon himself with six hundred Athenians being slain, with the loss only of seven Spartans; and yet this victory was too dear, Brasidas being mortally wounded. He was certainly one of the bravest, and one of the modestest men of his age, admired of all men for his great exploits, while at the same time he behaved with as much humility as the meanest citizen at Sparta; he exactly made good the letter he sent the ephori, when he first arrived in Thrace, and which was conceived in these words; What is for the honour of the state I will perform, or die [n]. Plutarch has preserved a saying of his, which both its good sense, and its being his, render worthy of being transcribed here. Looking one day among some dried figs, he catched a mouse, which immediately turned and bit his fingers, whereupon whereupon he let it go; You ſee, ſaid he to ſome who ſtood near him, That creatures that have but little ſtrength can get rid of invaders, if they dare exert the little they have [o]. The great miſchiefs which this captain had wrought the Athenians, and the mighty loſs which the Spartans conceived they had ſuſtained by his death, determined both ſtates to put an end to the war; Pliſtoanax laboured all he could to promote this diſpoſition, perſuading himſelf, that in a time of peace he ſhould be better able to deal with his mutinous ſubjects, than while a war was carrying on, the various events of which put it in their power to find daily new matter of reproach againſt him. We have ſeen on what account he was baniſhed, and we are aſſured, that he lived in exile nineteen years; his return was wrought by a reſponſe from Delphi, concerning which the Spartans affected afterwards to have many doubts, whether it came really from the god, or from ſome of Pliſtoanax's agents [p]. The king, however, getting the ephori for the time preſent to join with him, procured a peace to be concluded after the war had raged ten years. The peace was hardly made before new intrigues were ſet on foot in Peloponneſus; the Corinthians, and in general the allies of Sparta, were greatly offended with the peace, becauſe it did not exactly anſwer their private purpoſes; beſides they were apprehenſive leſt Sparta and Athens ſhould enter into a cloſe union, whereby the dominion of Peloponneſus might be left to the former, and the ſovereignty of the iſlands with the Grecian colonies in Aſia transferred to the latter. To defeat this ſcheme, if any ſuch there was or ſhould be, ſeveral of the Peloponneſian ſtates leagued themſelves with Argos, a very powerful republic, which had never any great friendſhip for Sparta, and which at this time ſeemed to threaten her; this league made the Lacedæmonians very uneaſy, and the more, when they found that the Argives, and thoſe who were allied with them, were nogotiating at Athens. Thither therefore the Lacedæmonians ſent their embaſſadors, who in all probability would have carried their point, if they had depended upon Nicias their old and conſtant friend; but ſuffering themſelves to be deceived by the artifices of Alcibiades, who, acting on his uncle Pericles's maxims, ſought to revive the war, they themſelves were were drawn to give the Athenians great ſuſpicion [q]. The next year the new ephori grew likewiſe fond of war, and though Nicias ſtrongly laboured to compoſe all differences, yet all he could obtain was no more than the ſwearing to the peace anew, which he well enough underſtood would not content his citizens [r]. In the ſummer when the XCth olympiad was celebrated, the Lacedæmonians received an high affront. The Eleans refuſed to let them ſacrifice, or in any manner partake of the ſacred rites, placing a ſtrong guard on the temple in order to prevent it; the reaſon aſſigned for this was, that the Lacedæmonians, while former olympics were held, had ſeized the caſtle of Phoricus, for which they were fined two hundred drachmæ, which fine they not having paid, they inſiſted on excluding them. The Lacedæmonians would have excuſed themſelves by their embaſſadors, but their excuſes were not accepted, and ſo they were forced to ſacrifice at home, which highly incenſed them [s] (K). A quarrel happened in the winter between [q] Thucyd. ubi ſupra. Diodor. ubi ſupra. Plut. in vit. Alcibiad. [r] Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra. Plut. in vit. Nic. [s] Thucyd. ubi ſupra. Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra. Pauſan. in Eleis.

[h] Thucyd. lib. ii. Diodor. lib. xii. Justin. lib. iv. Corn. Nepos, in vit. Cimon. Plut. in vit Periclis. [i] Thucyd. lib. iii. Plut. ubi supra. [k] Plut. Apophth. Lacon. [l] Thucyd. lib. iv. Diod. Sicul. lib. xii.

[m] Thucyd. lib. iv. Diodor. Sicul. lib. xii. [n] Thucyd. ubi supra. Diodor. Sicul. ubi supra. Plut. Apophth. Lacon.

[o] Plut. Apophtheg. Lacon. [p] Thucyd. lib. v. Diodor. Sicul. lib. xii. Plut. in vit. Nic.

(K) Of the Olympic games we have elſewhere ſpoken ſomewhat, but not enough to make either this or many other paſſages, which will hereafter follow, perfectly clear; and therefore we will take this opportunity of ſupplying theſe deficiencies here (38). The olympiads were not, as ſome imagine, celebrated every fifth year, nor were they, ſtrictly ſpeaking, celebrated every fourth year. They were held in the ſecond month of the fifth year, or, if it be poſſible to expreſs it clearer, after the completion of four full years (39). They began on the eleventh day of the lunar month, and laſted till the fifteenth, when the moon was full; there are various accounts of the inſtitutions of theſe games, but the moſt ſatisfactory is that given by Strabo, who in his deſcription of Elis ſays, that an Ætolian colony, together with ſome of Hercules's poſterity, after having ſubdued many of the Piſæan towns, and amongſt them Olympia, there inſtituted theſe ſolemnities (40). The care and management of theſe games belonged originally to the Piſæans, but afterwards to the Eleans, by whom the Piſæans were deſtroyed and their very name extinguiſhed; for the moſt part this nation enjoyed a profound tranquillity, the Greeks, out of a religious reſpect to their ſuperintendency of theſe games, between the Heracleans of Trachinia and the Theſſalians, wherein Penares a Lacedæmonian general was ſlain; however, the Corinthians were with-held from joining with the Argives, which gave ſome hopes that the power of that republic might be weakened [t]. The next year the Argives attempted to ſurprize Epidaurus, in hopes of ſecuring themſelves on that ſide againſt the Corinthians, and alſo open an eaſy paſſage to their allies the Athenians; in the winter the Lacedæmonians put a garriſon of three hundred men into Epidaurus. The next ſummer Sparta reſolved to exert herſelf, and to cruſh at once the Argives and their allies. With this view the ephori and ſenate ſent to exhort all their confederates to be in readineſs to take the field early, as they themſelves would be; they accordingly appeared, and king Agis at the head of the Spartans, Arcadians, Bœotians, games, not ſuffering the ſound of war to be heard amongſt them; which will be the leſs wondered at, if we conſider, that during the celebration of theſe games there was a general truce, that all the inhabitants of Greece might be at liberty to aſſiſt at them; and in conſequence of a breach of this truce the Eleans proceeded in the manner above deſcribed againſt the Spartans (41). The ſecurity, which for the generality theſe people enjoyed, made them addict themſelves more to huſbandry than any other people of Greece, becauſe they were under no ſort of reſtraint nor apprehenſion in their fields, but were conſidered as ſervants of the Olympian Jupiter. At firſt they appointed one judge only: At the fifteenth olympiad they aſſigned two, and by degrees theſe ſwelled to no leſs than twelve, one being choſen out of each of the Elean tribes (42). When the Arcadians become too powerful for the Eleans, the number decreaſed again; yet even in the reign of the Roman emperor Adrian there were no fewer of them than ten. All the perſons who fought to contend in theſe games were obliged to appear ten months before at Elis, where from that time till the games were over they were obliged to reſide, and to prepare themſelves after a certain ſettled method for their exerciſes. At the ſolemnity the Hellanodicæ, that is, the Elean judges, ſat naked, having the victoral crown before them, which, when the games were over, they preſented to him whoſe due they conceived it to be (43).

(38) Univerſal Hiſtory Vol. v. p. 434. (39) Johan. Tzetz. Chiliad. 1. Hiſt. 21. (40) Geogr. lib. viii.

[t] Diodor. & Thucyd. ubi ſupra.

(41) Diod. Sicul. lib. xi. (42) Pauſan. in Eliac. (43) Cælius Rhodiginus Antiq. Lect. lib. xxii. c. 17. Alex. ab Alexand. Genial. Dier. lib. v. c. 8.

ans, Corinthians, Sicyonians, Pellenians, Phliaſians and Megareans, entered the territory of Argos with ſuch an army as had not been ſeen ſince the beginning of the Peloponneſian war. The Argives were very ill prepared, the ſuccours they expected from Athens not being arrived; however, they reſolved to fight, though with inferior forces; but at the very inſtant the engagement ſhould have begun, two of the Argive captains cried out to king Agis, that their citizens were willing to do whatever was juſt, and to make peace with the Lacedæmonians; which made ſuch an impreſſion on the king, who was a prince of a mild and benevolent diſpoſition, that he immediately conſented to a truce of four months; which exceedingly povoked the allies of Sparta, who could not bear after all their preparations to ſee nothing effected. On the return therefore of Agis to Sparta, his citizens condemned him to pay a great fine, and would have raſed his houſe, if he had not promiſed them to redeem his honour by ſome great exploit when he ſhould be next employed, with which, however, they were hardly to be pacified; but what ſeems more extraordinary is, that the Argives were ſo unreaſonable as to puniſh their captains for having preſerved them from ruin, nay they carried their rage ſo far, that they had certainly knocked them in the head with ſtones, if they had not retired into ſanctuary [u]. The true reaſon why the Argives were ſo warm was, becauſe the Athenians had ſent them a ſupply of one thouſand foot and three hundred horſe under the command of Alcibiades, at whoſe inſtigation they ſolemnly renounced the truce made with Agis. When the Spartans were informed of this, they prepared to take the field; but they would not intruſt their king with the command of the army, without aſſigning him ten counſellors or field-deputies, without whoſe approbation he was to attempt nothing. At Mantinæa the armies fronted each other, being the greateſt that the Greeks had ever brought into the field againſt each other; but the Argives and their allies were more numerous than the Spartans; ſome therefore adviſed king Agis not to fight, to which he anſwered cooly, If we would rule many, we muſt fight many [x]. He diſpoſed his troops in excellent order, and gave directions ſuitable to the occaſion; but the generals under him did not behave ſo well, ſo that, while the right wing which was under his command carried all before it, the [u] Thucyd. ubi ſupra. Diodor. ubi ſupra. Pauſan. in Argol. Plut. in vit. Alcibiad. [x] Plut. Apoththegm. Lacon.

the left was routed, which when Agis beheld, he notwithſtanding continued his purſuit; and when the enemy was entirely broken in their left and centre, he turned ſhort, and charged their right in flank and rear, and after an obſtinate reſiſtance defeated them alſo, and gained a complete victory. King Pliſtoanax with a body of reſerve which had been left at Sparta, hearing of the great aſſiſtance which the Argives had received, marched to the reinforcement of Agis and his countrymen; but arrived not till the victory was gained, ſo that, his preſence being no longer neceſſary, he returned preſently after with his troops to Lacedæmon. The Argives and their allies loſt eleven hundred men in this battle, in which there fell three hundred Spartans; as for the allies of Sparta, as they did little, ſo they ſuffered little [y]. After this things continued in Greece in great confuſion, the faction in Argos who were for oligarchy ſiding with Sparta, thoſe who affected democracy with the Athenians; great ſtirs there were, and little peace; the Athenians at laſt ventured to break the league by attacking the iſle of Melos, of which, however, the Spartans would take no notice, only they cauſed proclamation to be made, that, ſince the Athenians preyed upon their ſubjects without regard to laws, their ſubjects might if they pleaſed prey upon the Athenians. The miſeries which her ambition had brought upon her were ſo evident in this ſtate, that ſhe began now to act with more wiſdom and mildneſs than hitherto ſhe had done; the Helotes were treated with lenity, a thouſand of them were actually ſet at liberty for the ſervice they had performed under Braſidas; their allies were uſed with mildneſs and reſpect, and the conſequences of theſe meaſures were, that matters began to take another aſpect; the Athenians, graſping too many things and acting haughtily, were deſpiſed, while Sparta gained the command and the hearts of moſt of the Peloponneſians [z]. In the laſt year of the XCIId olympiad Pliſtoanax died; the laſt act of his life which was memorable was reſettling the affairs of the Parrhaſians, who were torn with inteſtine wars; during the time of his exile his ſon Pauſanias had the regal title, his uncle Cleomenes acting as his tutor; but when Pliſtoanax was recalled, he again aſſumed the regal dignity, in which the ſame Pauſanias ſucceeded him at his death [a].

Agis

[y] Thucyd. ubi ſupra. Plut. ubi ſupra. Plut. in vit. Alcibiad.
[z] Pauſan. Lacon. Thucyd. ubi ſupra.
[a] Thucyd. ubi ſupra. Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra.

Agis king of Sparta was ſent with an army againſt the Eleans, to revenge the diſhonour done the republic, by forbidding them to be preſent at the Olympian games. This war was of ſome continuance; the firſt year the king penetrated as far almoſt as the mount Olympus, but an earthquake happening while he was in the field, his forces would needs return home. The next year Agis invaded Elis again and did a great deal of miſchief; whereupon Xenias an Elean put himſelf at the head of a party and declared for the Lacedæmonians, ſeeking in truth to eſtabliſh an oligarchy; but Thraſydrus, who was at the head of the other faction, prevailed, and drove him out of the city; the third year Agis entered Elis again, and after remaining there ſome time, he left a part of his army under the command of Lyſiſtratus a Spartan, with orders to ſupport Xenias and his friends. Thraſydrus, ſeeing plainly that his country would be ruined, came to a compoſition with Xenias, and by this means treated with the Spartans, whereupon a peace enſued [b]. The Peloponneſian war now broke out again: The Athenians had ſent a great army into Sicily, the conſequence of which being conſidered, the Lacedæmonians ſent Gylippus to aſſiſt the Syracuſans with a ſmall force, but with promiſe of farther ſupply, which was likewiſe performed [c]. About the ſame time Alcibiades repaired to Sparta, being expelled his own country by a prevailing faction; he fell immediately into the Spartan manner of living, which equally endeared him to the men and to the women; to the former he promiſed, that he would put them in a ſhort train of ending the war, and to the latter he pretended, that there were no women comparable to thoſe of Sparta. Agis was at firſt ſo charmed with him, that he took him home to his houſe; but he made him a very ill return for that favour by debauching his wife. As to the promiſes he had made the ſenate, he performed them tolerably well; for when he went with Agis to invade Attica, he adviſed him to fortify the caſtle of Decelea, which had never been thought of before, and which proved ſuch a thorn to the Athenians, as diſtreſſed them more than all that happened to them beſides; for now the Spartans did not come, as formerly, once a year into their neighbourhood, but were there continually, ſo that either they could not Agis enters the territories of Elis. Year after the Flood, 2276. Year before Chriſt, 723.

[b] Pauſan. in Eleis. [c] Thucyd. lib. vi. Diodor. Sicul. lib. xiii. Plut. in vit. Nic. Juſtin. l. iv.

not plough or ſow at all, or, if they did, their enemies bore away the crop [d]. The Spartans were ſo well pleaſed at this counſel of Alcibiades, that they cried him up as a captain far ſuperior to any of their own chiefs, which brought on him the envy of the nobility, which with the jealouſy of Agis made him glad to quit Laconia, to ſeek among the Barbarians a place of ſafety. Timæa the wife of Agis brought forth about this time a ſon, who was called Leotychides, concerning whom Agis ſaid publickly, that Alcibiades was his father; Timæa increaſed the ſuſpicion as to her ſon's birth by her own fooliſh behaviour, for ſhe was ever telling her maids, that the boy's name ought to be Alcibiades inſtead of Leotychides; and thus, while the child's birth was canvaſſed at home, Alcibiades confirmed all the ſuſpicions abroad, by ſaying openly, that he did not debauch Timæa out of luſt, but from the ambition he had of having ſome of his poſterity reign over the Spartans [e]; but his folly defeated his wickedneſs, as we ſhall ſee hereafter, and deprived the unhappy Leotychides of his ſucceſſion. Gylippus all this while managed their affairs in Sicily with great reputation; at firſt he was little ſet by, even among the Syracuſans whom he came to aſſiſt, becauſe of the plainneſs of his garb and of his ſpeech; but when by degrees they came to know him better, when they ſaw that the ſoldiers confided in him, and that great ſuccours were ſent him from Peloponneſus, they treated him with greater reſpect, and at laſt run into the other extreme, and would have put all things into his hands; but he was far from making an ill uſe of his power, he knew he was ſent to relieve the Sicilians, and not to oppreſs them; he was, however, covetous, and we ſhall ſee hereafter how that vice not only tarniſhed all his good qualities, but deſtroyed his fortune and ruined his reputation [f]. The defeat of the Athenians in Sicily filled the Spartans with great hopes; they neglected not therefore any means, that could be thought of, either to depreſs their rival's affairs, or to raiſe their own; Aſtyochus was ſent to command the foreign troops which were raiſed with Perſian money: King Agis managed the war in the heart of Attica, [d] Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra. Plut. in vit. Alcibiad. Corn. Nepos, in vit. Alcibiad. [e] Diodor. Sicul. lib. xiii. Plut. in vit. Alcibiad. & Ageſil. Corn. Nepos, in vit. Alcibiad. Juſtin. lib. v. c. 2. [f] Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra. Plut. in vit. Nic. Juſtin. iv. 4.

tica, where he had all the ſummer a good army, beſides the garriſon in Decelea [g]. Lyſander was now employed in maritime affairs; and as he proved the great hero of Sparta, and the finiſher of the Peloponneſian war, it is fit, that we ſhould in this place give the reader his character. Plutarch ſays, that though it is not certain that he was of either of the royal families, yet it was generally agreed, that he was of the Herculean race. His education was truly Spartan, that is, he paſſed his younger years under all the reſtrictions of the Lycurgic inſtitutes, which rendered him bold, hardy, patient, and capable of great things; he was naturally ambitious, and an extenſive genius, was affable, in his behaviour modeſt, vigilant, and indefatigable; but with theſe great qualities he had ſome mean ones; he could to ſerve his own purpoſes be very ſupple and complaiſant, which was highly repugnant to the Spartan cuſtoms; he was not much affected with the love of Greece, but converſed freely with all ſorts of people, and ſought above all things to raiſe his own credit and authority; the worſt of all was, that he was abſolutely diſhoneſt, and, which is not a little ſtrange, ſought not to conceal it, it being a common ſaying of his, That children were cheated with play-things, and men with oaths; for which reaſon he never denied his when it made for his intereſt, or ſtuck at breaking it when to keep it would ſerve his purpoſes no longer. He found the Athenians greatly ſuperior at ſea when he entered upon command, and yet in a very few years he left them without any power at all [h]. The firſt thing of importance that he did was reſtoring the ſtate of affairs at Epheſus; he found that city very convenient, he therefore engaged the principal men in it to ſide with Sparta, and above all things to attach themſelves to him; he ſhewed them how conveniently they were ſeated for trade, he brought his ſhips to be refitted in their port, and when once he had gained the confidence of the Epheſians, he took equal care to promote their intereſts, and to make theirs ſubſervient to his. Aſtyochus having managed fooliſhly, and given Alcibiades an opportunity of inſtilling into Tiſſaphernes notions prejudicial to the Lacedæmonians, Lyſander, who ſaw clearly that without the Barbarian gold Sparta could not carry on the war, determined with himſelf to counterplot both Tiſſaphernes and Alcibiades, by applying

[g] Thucyd. lib. vi. Diodor. Sicul. lib. xiii. [h] Plut. in vit. Lyſand. Diodor. Sicul. lib. xiii. Juſtin. lib. v. c. 6, Corn. Nepos, in vit. Lyſand. Thucyd. lib. vi.

ing himſelf to Cyrus, who then reſided at Sardis; thither therefore he went, and fully opened to the young prince the treachery of his father's lieutenant; Cyrus readily heard him, and by degrees the Spartan won ſo much upon him, that he made him a promiſe in few words to grant him whatever he ſhould requeſt; Lyſander modeſtly required, that a ſmall addition might be made to the ſoldiers pay, which diſintereſtedneſs ſo much charmed Cyrus, that he gave him ten thouſand pieces of ſilver, which he made uſe of to ſupport his ſoldiers and refit his fleet. Agis, in the mean time being informed of great ſtirs in Athens, attempted to ſurprize it, but without effect; for the citizens on his approach, united among themſelves, and ſallied with ſuch unexpected fury, that they killed a conſiderable number of his men [i]. They afterwards offered to make peace, but the Spartans, conſidering the unſettledneſs of their government, refuſed ſo much as to hear their propoſitions; ſome ſhort time after Hegeſandrides a Spartan reduced Eubæa, and, if he had proſecuted his ſucceſs with ardor, might have taken Athens itſelf; but this opportunity being neglected, Alcibiades in a very ſhort ſpace ſo reſtored their affairs, by defeating and killing Mindarus, who had ſucceeded Aſtyochus, that the Spartans in their turn were forced to ſue to the Athenians, who with great haughtineſs rejected the propoſitions they offered, though highly reaſonable in themſelves. When Alcibiades ſailed again into the Helleſpont, after he had been at Athens, Lyſander, finding himſelf too weak to engage ſo numerous a fleet under ſo fortunate a general, kept in the port of Epheſus, where he carefully refitted his ſhips, and kept his ſoldiers and his mariners to their exerciſe. At length it ſo happened, that Alcibiades had occaſion to go from Samos to Phocea, whereupon he committed the care of his fleet to Antiochus a favourite of his, who, proud of his command, quickly forgot the inſtructions which had been given him, and ſailing out of port with two gallies only, went with them to the mouth of the haven of Epheſus, where he inſulted Lyſander; this inconſiderate action produced in the end a general engagement, wherein the Athenians were defeated, though with no very conſiderable loſs, and yet this accident deſtroyed all their affairs; for upon the firſt news of it they diſmiſſed Alcibiades, and with him their good fortune. Lyſander, while he lay at Epheſus, projected a ſcheme

[i] Diodor. lib. xiii. Thucyd. lib. vi.

ſcheme for making himſelf in a manner ſovereign of Greece; he picked up enterprizing men of various cities, and, engaging them to ſettle at Epheſus, adviſed them to live in ſtrict friendſhip among themſelves, and to ſtudy political affairs, for that he would ſuddenly find employment for them [k]. All this, and indeed the whole tenor of his behaviour, made him extremely grateful to the Epheſians and the reſt of the cities in that part of the world, ſo that when Callicratidas was ſent him for a ſucceſſor, all the Aſiatic Greeks were extremely uneaſy; this uneaſineſs increaſed at the preſence of the new admiral, who was the very reverſe of Lyſander, a man of great parts and great courage, but withal of great virtue and unbiaſſed integrity [l]. Lyſander dealt with him very baſely, he ſent back what money remained in his hands to Cyrus, and ſaid to his ſucceſſor at parting with a ſneer, Let us ſee now, Callicratidas, how you can ſupport the charges of this army. The noble Spartan found it indeed very difficult, the people were quite drained, treaſure there was none, ſo that he was forced to go to the court of Cyrus, where being two or three times refuſed admittance, being ſometimes told that the king was buſy, at other times that he was drinking, he at laſt ſaid, I muſt not be ſo eager for money, as to do any thing unbecoming Sparta: Whereupon he ſet ſail for Epheſus. Cyrus, conſidering better of the matter, ſent him afterwards money to pay his forces, and ſome preſents for himſelf: the firſt he took, but the latter he ſent back again with this memorable meſſage, That there needed no private friendſhip between Cyrus and him, becauſe if the king kept up the terms of his league with the Lacedæmonians, he ſhould think himſelf included therein [m]. He defeated Conon the Athenian admiral, and beſieged him in Mitylene; he likewiſe beat a ſmall fleet that was ſent to his aſſiſtance; but hearing afterwards that the enemy's grand fleet was at Arginuſæ, over-againſt Lesbos where he was ſtationed, he reſolved to engage, tho' when he ſacrificed in the morning, the prieſt who conſulted the entrails told him, that the fleet ſhould in the end proſper, but that the admiral would certainly be ſlain: To which he anſwered without any concern, Very well then, let us fight, Sparta will not loſe much in loſing me; but ſhe would loſe her honour, if I retired in the ſight of the enemy; when I fall, let Cleander be your admiral. He was accordingly cordingly ſlain, and by that means the Spartan affairs were put into much diſorder [n]. After this miſhap both Cyrus and the allies of Lacedæmon demanded that Lyſander ſhould be ſent admiral again, a requeſt directly oppoſite to the laws of Sparta; however, to gratify their requeſt, they gave the title of admiral to one Aracus, but lodged the power with Lyſander, who immediately ſailed to the Helleſpont, where, after receiving great ſupplies from Cyrus, he drew together his fleet; but finding the Athenians much ſuperior to him in numbers, he very wiſely avoided an engagement, and afterwards giving them the ſlip, appeared ſuddenly in the neighbourhood of Greece, and made deſcents on the iſlands of Ægina and Salamis; he ſailed over to the coaſt of Attica to ſhew Agis, who was come thither with a land army, what a noble navy was under his power [o]. Yet having intelligence that the Athenian fleet was approaching, he ſtood away for the Helleſpont, where he beſieged and took Lampſacus. Conon with the grand fleet of Athens bearing down upon him thither, he retired to the river Agos; there the Athenians inſulted him for many days together, which Lyſander bore with wonderful patience, keeping his ſoldiers and mariners continually on duty, till on a ſudden, when the Athenians had debarqued their forces, he unawares attacked them both by land and ſea. Conon the admiral ſaw clearly that all things were loſt, ſo he, with eight gallies and a very inconſiderable body of men, fled away to Cyprus; the reſt fell entirely into the hands of Lyſander, who in a ſingle hour put an end to the Peloponneſian war, and to the maritime power of Athens [q].

[k] Plut. in vit. Lyſand. Diodor. Sicul. lib. xiii. [l] Thucyd. lib. vi. Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra. Plut. in vit. Lyſand. [m] Plut. Apophtheg. Lacon. in vit. Lyſand.

The Athenians entirely defeated by Lyſander. Year after the Flood, 2593. Before Chriſt, 406.

THIS mighty victory having put all things into the power of Lyſander, he acted rather as a univerſal monarch, than as a general from Sparta; he immediately viſited all the neighbouring cities, and changed, whether they would or not, their government, placing in each of them a Spartan as chief magiſtrate, and with him ten of his friends from Epheſus, where, as we have before obſerved, he erected a kind of political univerſity. Theſe men as they came in by force, ſo they kept no meaſures with thoſe over whom they [n] Thucyd. lib. vi. Diodor. Sicul. lib. xiii. Plut. Apophtheg. Lacon. [o] Diodor. Sicul. lib. xiii. [p] Plut. in vit. Lyſand. Xenoph. Hell. lib. ii. [q] Xenophon. ubi ſupra. Diodor. ubi ſupra. Plut. in vit. Lyſand. Corn. Nepos. in vit. ejuſd. Juſtin. lib. v. c. 6.

they ruled, they treated them with the utmoſt haughtineſs and ſeverity, ſo that from the very beginning the Lacedæmonian government was rendered ungrateful, and the people univerſally diſpoſed to ſhake it off as ſoon as they could [r]. As he was no hoarder of money, he collected all the maſs of wealth which his victories had brought into his hands, and deſtined it to be ſent to Sparta, whither he had before diſpatched a meſſenger with news of his victory, and with an aſſurance, that he would be ſhortly with a fleet of two hundred ſail before the city of Athens; in confidence of this the Spartans ſent both their kings, Agis and Pauſanias, with a very great army into Attica, on the coaſts of which in due time Lyſander arrived. As to what happened remarkable in the ſiege of Athens, we have already inſiſted thereon in its proper place. Here it is enough that we inſert the Spartan decree contained in the articles granted to the dejected inhabitants of that once famous place, which decree is preſerved by Plutarch, and runs thus: Know, this is the decree of the Lacedæmonians. Pull ye down the Pyræum and the long walls, quit all the towns you are now poſſeſſed of, and keep within your own territories. We grant you peace upon theſe conditions, provided you yield alſo to what ſhall be further thought reaſonable, and receive again your exiles. As for the number of ſhips you may keep, obſerve the orders we ſhall hereafter give on that head. Lyſander deprived them of all their veſſels except twelve, and having their fortifications delivered into his hands, he entered Athens in triumph on the anniverſary of the great victory at Salamis; he cauſed the walls to be demoliſhed to the ſound of muſic, which likewiſe played while the Athenian ſhips were burning, himſelf and his commanders having garlands on their heads; he alſo altered the government, eſtabliſhed the thirty tyrants, and left a Spartan garriſon in the citadel commanded by one of his own creatures [s]. The next thing he did was to ſend the immenſe treaſure he had collected to Sparta under the care of Gylippus, who had ſo eminently diſtinguiſhed himſelf in Sicily, and who found a way to diſtinguiſh himſelf no leſs eminently nently on this occaſion, though leſs honourably; for he, little regarding the ſeals upon the money bags, ript them open at the bottom, and, having taken out what money he thought proper, ſewed them up again. When he arrived at Lacedæmon he delivered the money as he had been directed, and deſired that particular notice might be taken of the fairneſs of the ſeals; but unluckily for him, Lyſander had put in each bag a ticket, expreſſing the ſum of money contained therein; upon comparing theſe notes with the ſums contained a deficiency was diſcovered, but ſtill the ephori and ſenate were at a loſs where to fix it; at laſt the ſervant of Gylippus impeached him; and, his crime with all its circumſtances being detected, he was forced to leave his native country, and to go into exile with the ſcandalous imputation of being a cheat and a thief [t] (L). The coming of [t] Plut. in vit. Lyſand. Diodor. ubi ſupra.

[r] Xenophon. ubi ſupra, Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra. [s] Plutarch. in vit. Lyſand. Xenophon. Hellan. lib. ii. Corn. Nepos, in vit. Lyſand.

(L) Gylippus the Spartan had this vice of covetouſneſs hereditary in his family; his father Cleondrides having, as we have before ſhewn, ſuffered death for accepting a bribe from Pericles, when he entered Attica with an army (42). Authors are pretty much divided as to the character of this man. Plutarch every where repreſents him as a perſon of courage, integrity, and humanity, till this laſt act (43); but Diodorus the Sicilian gives him quite another character; he introduces him making two long ſpeeches at Syracuſe to influence the Sicilians to ſhew the Athenians no mercy; this is directly contrary to what other hiſtorians have written, and on what authority he reports thoſe orations we know not (44). It is true, the favour he was in with Lyſander ſeems to throw a ſhade on his character; for we do not find that this ambitious general either loved or truſted men of ſtrict honour, and from the beginning Gylippus was one of his creatures; it was he who preferred him to the command in Sicily, and in the preſent caſe, as a ſignal mark of his confidence, ſent him with the treaſure he had collected in the war, to Sparta; ſo that to ſpeak the truth, this was not only a public theft, but an act of private ingratitude, and therefore we need not wonder, that his patron, who in other reſpects was ready enough to protect his friends even in ill things, abandoned him. How Gylippus came to truſt his ſervant we are not of this huge maſs of wealth created great diſputes at Sparta; many celebrated Lyſander's praiſes and rejoiced exceedingly at this good fortune, as they called it; others, who were better acquainted with the nature of things and with their conſtitution, were of quite another opinion; they looked upon the receipt of this treaſure as an open violation of the laws of Lycurgus, and they expreſſed their apprehenſions loudly, that in proceſs of time they might by a change in their manners pay infinitely more for this money than it was worth; at laſt a compromiſe was propoſed and agreed to, whereby it was enacted, That the ſtate might make uſe of gold and ſilver, but that private men ſhould poſſeſs neither on pain of capital puniſhments, which reſolution of theirs, as Plutarch obſerves, was ſhallow, ſuperficial, and ineffectual, becauſe declaring money to be uſeful to the ſtate evidently juſtified the inclination of private men to be poſſeſſed of it, while at the ſame time the law made the gratification of that inclination penal [u]. Lyſander in the mean time returning to the Helleſpont, returned alſo to his old practices there, changing governments, new modelling cities, liberally, and even profuſely, rewarding his friends, and at the ſame time purſuing to death and utter deſtruction ſuch as he ſuſpected to be his enemies. While he remained in Greece he not acquainted; but the manner in which that ſervant of his betrayed him, Plutarch tells us pleaſantly enough. "The magiſtrates, ſays he, finding the money in the bags leſs than "what was expreſſed in the notes contained in them, were "ſurprized, but did not in the leaſt ſuſpect him who had the "care of the money, till Gylippus's ſervant betrayed the ſe-"cret; and told them by way of riddle, That he had ob-"ſerved a great many owls to rooſt in the Ceramicus. The "ephori ſoon found out that by owls pieces of money were "to be underſtood, becauſe moſt of the coin then bore the "impreſſion of an owl in reſpect to the Athenians; and that the "Ceramicus, a place in Athens ſo called becauſe of a tile-kiln "that had been there, ſignified likewiſe the roof of an houſe "by reaſon of the tiles called Ceramoi; thus the myſtery came "to be underſtood, and Gylippus, having ſtained his former "reputation with this mean action, was aſhamed to appear any "more at Lacedæmon (45)".

(42) Vol. 6. p. 456. (43) In vit. Niciæ & in vit. Lyſand.
(44) Diodor. Sicul. lib. xii.

[u] Plut. ubi ſupra. Diodor. ubi ſupra.

(45) In vit. Lyſander.

he had done ſome very extraordinary things, which ſufficiently betrayed the height of an imperious diſpoſition; he ſet up his own ſtatue, and the ſtatues of ſuch of his commanders who were in his good graces, in braſs; he dedicated two ſtars in honour of the deities Caſtor and Pollux, in order to keep up an opinion, which his ſycophants had taken care to propagate, that theſe ſtars were ſeen in the rigging of his ſhip at the battle of Ægos [x]. But if he acted thus in Greece, he ſet leſs bounds to his ambition in Aſia, where he made not only the Greek cities dependent on him, but ſtruck terror into the Perſian governors, and particularly maltreated Pharnabazus. This Perſian grandee was a man of profound capacity, and a maſter in Lyſander's ſcience of diſſimulation: He ſaw, that little was to be expected from any repreſentations he could make to this haughty general, ſurrounded by a number of powerful perſons made ſo merely by his favour; he caſt about therefore to find out ſurer protectors, though at a greater diſtance, and with this view diſpatched ſome of his emiſſaries to Sparta. There they began to open, without apprehenſion of danger, the iniquity of Lyſander's conduct, they ſet his ambitious deſigns in their proper light, they charged him with an intention to render himſelf a general for life and independent of his conſtituents; and they alledged ſuch probable reaſons for what they ſaid, that the ephori and ſenate immediately diſpatched a Scytale to recal this terror of Aſia. They began likewiſe to inſpect narrowly the conduct of his friends in Greece, put ſome of them to death, and amongſt the reſt Thorax one of his principal commanders, in whoſe houſe, in controvention of the late law, they found a large quantity of ſilver. The ſurprize of Lyſander, was inexpreſſible, when the meſſenger of the ſtate preſented the Scytale which recalled him (M): He [x] Plut. ubi ſupra.

(M) In this note we intend to explain the Scytale of the Lacedæmonians; but firſt, let us hear what Plutarch ſays of them: "The nature and uſe, ſays he, of theſe was, when the "magiſtrates gave their commiſſion to any admiral or general, "they took two round pieces of wood, both exactly equal "in breadth and thickneſs; one they kept themſelves, the "other was delivered to their officer, ſo that, when they had "any thing of moment which they would ſecretly convey

"to

He had no previous intelligence of it, nor could he immediately gueſs by whom it was obtained, but on recollection he determined in himſelf, that it muſt have been by the procurement of Pharnabazus; this diſcovery made him more ſollicitous, eſpecially when he heard what had happened at home; he therefore reſolved according to his ſtated maxim, to eke out the lion's with the fox's ſkin[y]; in conſequence of this he demanded a conference, to which Pharnabazus readily yielded. At this meeting Lyſander made uſe of all his art to ſoften the Perſian, and to engage

[y] Plut. in Apophtheg.

" to him, they cut a long narrow ſcrowl of parchment, and " rowling it about their own ſtaff, one fold cloſe upon ano- " ther, they wrote their buſineſs on it; when they had wrote " what they had to ſay, they took off the parchment and " ſent it to the general, he applied it to his own ſtaff, which " being juſt like that of the magiſtrates, the fold fell in with " each other, exactly as they did at the writing; and the " characters, which, before it was wrapped up, were confuſedly " diſjoined and altogether unintelligible, appeared then very " plainly (46)". There are many things omitted in this account which we ſhall endeavour to ſupply from other authors. Tzetzes calls them wands, which the ephori delivered to the general or admiral when he ſet out to take upon him the command; he ſays, they were very ſhort and very ſlender, the parchment being alſo narrow, which they made uſe of to fold round them (47). It is very probable, that our author conjectured this from the uſual ſhortneſs of the Spartan epiſtles; for Demetrius Triclinius tells us expreſly, that the Scytale was between three and four cubits long; he does indeed ſuggeſt that there was but one of them which was ſplit in two, and one half being given to the general, the other half remained at home (48); but Aulus Gellius (49) and the ſcholiaſt on Ariſtophanes ſay expreſly, there were two (50); Thucydides ſays, the Scytale was round, ſmooth, and long (51); the ſcholiaſt on Pindar, that it was made of a black wood (52). It ſhould ſeem, that, beſides the ſtate-Scytale, private men made uſe of a contrivance of the like nature to prevent deceits in contracts, but then theſe were exactly like our tallies.

(46) Plut. in vit. Lyſand. (47) Joan. Tzetzes. var. Hiſt. Chil. ix. c. 258. (48) Ad. Pindar. Olymp. Od. vi. (49) Noct. Attic. lib. xvii. cap. 9. (50) Ad Aves Ariſtoph. (51) Bell. Pelop. lib. i. (52) Olymp. vi.

engage him by a letter under his hand to deny what might have been ſuggeſted in his name to the ephori and ſenate, to which with ſome difficulty Pharnabazus agreed; he wrote this letter in Lyſander's preſence and in terms ſuitable to his wiſh; but he had before prepared a letter of quite a different nature, and ſubſtituted it while he pretended to fold the other, ſo that here the deceiver was deceived, and Lyſander with all his ſkill outwitted [z]. Receiving this letter, he ſet out immediately for Sparta, but when he was informed of its contents he was mightily diſturbed, and fearing leſt he ſhould be called to an account, pretended that he had ſeen a viſion, wherein Jupiter Ammon had commanded him to come immediately and conſult his oracle. The ephori and ſenate ſhewed a good deal of reluctance in granting his requeſt, but, as ſoon as he was gone, the kings of Sparta began to contrive the deſtruction of his friends, that he might no longer have ſuch an intereſt in Aſia as at this time he had. The Athenians at this time taking arms againſt their tyrants, Lyſander hearing thereof returned ſuddenly to Sparta, where he vehemently preſſed the government to ſupport thoſe he had eſtabliſhed at Athens, and that they would make uſe of him as commander in chief in that expedition. This greatly alarmed the kings, wherefore they determined to make uſe of all their intereſt to prevent it. Pauſanias therefore procured the command of the army to be veſted in him, and marched, as it was generally underſtood, to ſupport the tyrants againſt the people of Athens; but in truth his deſign was to reconcile the Athenians, and to compromiſe their differences with Sparta, that Lyſander might not have the honour of conquering this city twice, which he alſo effected, and which Lyſander highly reſented. Not long after he had an opportunity of venting his ſpleen and of reconciling himſelf to the people; for the Athenians, according to the ficklenеſs of their temper, flying out again, the Spartans were highly incenſed againſt Pauſanias, and cried up Lyſander for a man of integrity and true public ſpirit [a]. While things were in this ſituation king Agis died; he was taken ill at Heræa in Arcadia, and being conveyed to Sparta died there; in his laſt moments he owned Leotychides, moved thereto by his tears and earneſt entreaties; and at the ſame time that he did this, he beſought the Lacedæmonians who were preſent to bear bear witneſs of the ſincerity of his declaration, and that he from his heart retracted what at any time he might have raſhly ſaid of his ſuſpecting the legitimacy of Leotychides; but this late recognition of his ſon was, as we ſhall preſently ſhew, altogether ineffectual, Leotychides loſing not only his pretenſions to the crown, but his paternal eſtate [b].

[z] Plut. in vit. Lyſand. Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra. [a] Plut. ubi ſupra.

Agis left behind him a younger brother whoſe name was Ageſilaus, and who became not only an honour to Sparta, but to Greece itſelf. This Ageſilaus ſet up for the crown againſt Leotychides, and, as he was a man of extraordinary virtues and great capacity, he on his firſt declaration had many friends, and on Lyſander's eſpouſing his intereſt acquired many more: for both theſe it is proper that we ſhould account. Ageſilaus was born a younger brother, and though the laws of Lacedæmon, which began now to be greatly relaxed, did not compel the heirs apparent to the crown to endure the harſh diſcipline of the Lycurgic education; yet the younger children of kings were no leſs ſeverely bred than the meaneſt Lacedæmonian, which proved a great happineſs to the prince of whom we are ſpeaking, who for the glory of a long and happy reign was chiefly indebted to the foundation laid by this manner of education; his temper was compounded of thoſe qualities which very rarely meet, that is, of ſuch as render men ambitious and aſpiring and of ſuch as make them amiable and beloved. He was brave, active, and of a high ſpirit; but with all this wonderfully good-natured, gentle, tractable, and fond of his country perhaps beyond compariſon; for he preferred her intereſt not only to his own, to his peace, and to his ſafety, but to his honour and his reputation; he thought all things fit which ſhe commanded, and placed his utmoſt happineſs in his capacity of ſerving her, not only on ſuch occaſions as were attended with luſtre and eclat, but in thoſe which had neither profit nor honour to recommend them [c]. Such were the means whereby Ageſilaus gained to himſelf friends; as for the regard which Lyſander had for him, it ſprung thus: When Ageſilaus was a youth Lyſander was his lover, and this friendſhip of his continued when Ageſilaus was grown up, and mightily facilitated his mounting the throne. There was but one thing which gave this prince and his friends any trouble, and it was

Ageſilaus ſucceeds Agis, and ſets aſide Leotychides.

[b] Plut. in vit. Ageſil. Pauſan. Lacon. [c] Plutarch. in vit. Ageſil. & in Apophthegm. Lacon. Xenophon. Hellen. lib. iii. Corn. Nepos, in vit. Ageſil.

was this; one Diopithes, a man reputed to have great ſkill in oracles, produced one to the following effect:

Tho' great thy empire, Sparta, yet refrain
From a lame reign, which come, thou ſhalt ſuſtain
Ills unendur'd before; and feel the rage
Of war, no force can quell, or ſkill aſſuage (N).

THIS

(N) It was the cuſtom of the Greeks, as we have ſhewn in this and in the Athenian hiſtory, never to undertake any act of importance without conſulting an oracle, of which there were many in Greece; but that of Delphi was the moſt remarkable. Many learned men ſeem to be of opinion, that the reſponſes from thence were frequently ſupernatural, and ſometimes plain and direct, juſtified alſo by the event. However that matter be, yet certain it is, that even in the moſt early times they were frequently corrupted, of which we have given many inſtances, and in the proſecution of our hiſtory ſhall have occaſion to give many more. If public oracles were liable to ſuch inconveniencies, in ſpight of all the care that could be taken of them, it is eaſy to conceive, that the collections of oracles in private hands were much more liable to alterations and interpolations. To ſay the truth, where-ever a ſuperſtitious humour of believing ſuch ſort of things prevails, experience ſhews us, that there will be always knaves equally capable and willing to impoſe on fools. Theſe keepers of oracles were ſtiled divine or ſacred perſons by the Greeks, and from the inſtance before us we ſee what mighty things they were able to effect. Plutarch ſpeaks very reſpectfully of Diopithes, who produced the oracle which gave occaſion to this note; and to do juſtice, we muſt acknowledge, that the oracle was fulfilled in two ſenſes; yet with us, this is no indubitable argument that it was genuine, ſince it is almoſt impoſſible to contrive an oracle in relation to a momentous event, which ſome time or other will not be accompliſhed. It is very remarkable, that Diopithes, who by his profeſſion was an interpreter of theſe ſort of pieces, departed from the letter of the oracle in his ſolution, and that Lyſander ſhould have addreſs enough to conquer the prophet in his own profeſſion (53); for, as Xenophon juſtly obſerves, the oracle ſpeaks not of a lame king, but a lame reign, as appears from the words thereof twice cited by Plutarch (54). By the way, it may not be amiſs to obſerve, that in all our verſions of Plutarch into Engliſh, theſe oracles are conſtantly rendered wrong, the word heir

(53) Plutarch, in vit. Lyſand. & in vit. Ageſil. (54) Xenophon. Hellen. lib. iii.

THIS was thought to point at Ageſilaus, who had one leg ſhorter than the other, but Lyſander outdid the interpreter even in his own ſcience; The oracle, ſaid he, cannot poſſibly point at a lameneſs in the king's leg, that is a thing which the gods cannot hate, becauſe they cauſed it; the lameneſs muſt be in the title; beware therefore, O Lacedæmonians, of placing an illegitimate king on the throne, nay even one whoſe birth is ſuſpected, for that is moſt likely to be the lame reign hinted at by the oracle [d]. Lyſander's explication, backed by his authority, had the deſired heir being ſubſtituted inſtead of kingdom (55), which is of mighty conſequence; firſt, becauſe it miſrepreſents the ſenſe of the oracle; and ſecondly, becauſe it leaves no room for Lyſander's interpretation, though Plutarch himſelf acknowledges it was well received, and Xenophon aſcribes Ageſilaus's carrying his cauſe to the ſeeming rectitude of this explanation. After all, if there was any thing ſupernatural in this oracle, it was never rightly underſtood, till very lately M. le Fevre declared its true meaning to be, that Sparta ſhould take care to preſerve both her kings, or, if we may be for once allowed to make uſe of technical terms, to guard againſt changing her duarchy into a monarchy; and in this ſenſe the oracle is moſt ſignally accompliſhed, as we ſhall hereafter have occaſion to ſhew (56). In the mean time let us obſerve, that Plutarch approved Diopithes's interpretation; he conceived, that Leotychides was moſt outrageouſly injured, and that the great evils which befel Sparta during the reign of Ageſilaus were the puniſhments threatened by the oracle, in caſe ſhe ſuffered herſelf to be governed by a lame king. Xenophon on the contrary affirms, that Ageſilaus deſtroyed Leotychides's claim by three invincible arguments; the firſt was the repeated declarations of his ſuppoſed father Agis; ſecondly his mother, who ought to know beſt, averred the ſame thing; laſtly, that Neptune having by an earthquake forced Agis out of bed from his wife, he thereupon abſtained from her ten months, after the expiration of which term Leotychides was born (57). To cloſe this account; let us obſerve, that there is no reaſon in the world to doubt the impartiality of Plutarch, and that the hiſtory of Xenophon is an open panegyric on Ageſilaus, whoſe friend and confident he was.

[d] Xenophon. Hellen. lib. iii. Plut. in vit. Ageſil. & Lyſand. Juſtin. lib. vi. c. 4. Corn. Nepos, in vit. Ageſil. & Lyſand.

(55) See the lives of Lyſander and Ageſilaus in Plutarch's lives both of the old and new tranſlation. (56) Faber. in Juſtin. lib. vi. (57) Ubi ſupra.

desired effect; the senate and people excluded Leotychides alike from the kingdom and from the private estate of his father; half of this estate of Agis Agesilaus bestowed on that prince's relations by the mother's side, who, though they were persons of great merit, were till this time in very low circumstances, which gained the new king the hearts of the people. Instead of opposing either the ephori or the senate, he treated them with the utmost civility, and not only so, but with the greatest confidence and affection; those who were of the opposite party at the time of his election he was very studious to oblige; he preferred them, whenever their merit gave them a reasonable pretence thereto; he relieved them when under misfortunes; in fine, he acted so prudently and so benignly, that at last the ephori, seeing no ill qualities to be offended with, took umbrage at his good ones, and laid a mulct on him for a very extraordinary crime, viz. Monopolizing the affections of the people; which, however, was consonant enough to the constitution of Sparta [e]. Before Agesilaus was well settled on the throne, his country found itself exceedingly distressed; the Persian king, to whom in the course of the war they owed such mighty obligations, declared himself at once their open enemy, and began to make mighty preparations for dispossessing them of their maritime empire. To have a just notion of this business we must ascend a little higher: Lysander while he continued in Asia had paid all his court to Cyrus the younger brother of Artaxerxes, who on the death of his father ascended the Persian throne; in consequence of this friendship between Lysander and Cyrus, Clearchus the Lacedæmonian general received orders from the ephori and senate to assist that prince, to the utmost of his power, in the rebellion he had raised against his brother. It was in these troops that Xenophon had a command, and it was at the head of them, after Clearchus and the other captains were taken off, that he made that retreat called the Retreat of the ten thousand; this behaviour of the Lacedæmonians drew upon them the hate of the king, who ever after spoke of them in terms of disrespect, and sought as much as in him lay to destroy their power [f]. It is very probable, that some of the wisest of the Persian

[e] Xenophon. ubi supra. Plut. in vit. Agesil. & in Apophthegm. Lacon. Corn. Nepos, in vit. Agesil. [f] Xenophon. Hellen. lib. i, ii, iii. Diodor. lib. xii, xiii. Plut. in vit. Agesil Artaxerx. Justin. lib. v. c. 11.

Perſian ſtateſmen managed this diſpoſition of the king for effecting what they rightly conceived to be the intereſt of his empire; this is rendered probable from the method that was immediately taken, viz. of ſending relief to Athens, and money into to Bæotia; at the ſame he determinded to reduce all the Greek cities abſolutely to his obedience, which was wounding Sparta in the tendereſt part, ſhe having over and over declared herſelf the protectreſs of the Grecian liberties; on this account it was that they ſent Thimbro with an army conſiſting of a thouſand Laconian foot, four thouſand Peloponneſian infantry, and three hundred horſe from Athens; this man managed the war but indifferently, ſuffering his troops, ſince he could make no impreſſion on the enemy, to plunder the allies of Lacedæmon. The ephori therefore ſent Dercyllidas to ſucceed him; this man was a great engineer, and likewiſe a great politician; he found his force too ſmall to prevail againſt Pharnabazus and Tiſſaphernes, the king's lieutenants; he reſolved to remedy this evil by making them deſtroy one another, in which he ſucceeded ſo well, that he prevailed upon the latter to remain inactive while he attacked the former, over whom he gained great advantages. When at the command of their maſters theſe governors of provinces became friends, the Spartan was left to deal with them both, which he did without any loſs, though his army did not exceed ſeven thouſand men, and the Perſians had twenty thouſand foot and ten thouſand horſe in the field, beſides great garriſons. Pharnabazus was indeed for fighting, but Tiſſaphernes, who was a better officer and who knew well what theſe Greek troops were capable of, was of quite a different opinion; wherefore having entered into negotiations with Dercyllidas, he at length concluded with him a treaty of accommodation on theſe terms; That the Greek cities ſhould remain free; that his army ſhould retire out of his province; that the Lacedæmonian governors ſhould remove out of the cities; and that this treaty ſhould ſubſiſt, till it was either ratified or diſavowed by the king of Perſia and the ſtate of Sparta. The Perſian king, however, within a ſhort time after began to fit out three hundred ſail of ſhips of war, which greatly alarmed the Greek cities and occaſioned an application to Sparta; where, as we ſhall ſoon ſee, Ageſilaus offered himſelf by the advice of Lyſander, and was declared general of Greece [g]. But, before any reſolution was taken, the king ſacrificing for his country according to cuſtom, the augur, from the bowels of three ſeveral victims, declared, there was ſome very great conſpiracy on foot againſt him and all the magiſtrates of Sparta; a little of this conſpiracy was diſcovered to the bottom by the information of one of the perſons concerned, whereupon the ſenate took ſuch quick meaſures, though with ſome little injury to the laws, that all the conſpirators were ſuddenly taken out of the way [h] (O). Things were

[g] Xenophon. ubi ſupra. Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra. Juſtin. lib. vi. c. 1. Plut. in vit. Lyſand. Polyæn. Strateg. lib. vi.

[h] Plut. in vit. Ageſil.

(O) It is a great misfortune to ſuch as endeavour to collect the Greek hiſtory from the lives of Plutarch, that they find it impracticable to diſtinguiſh any method in his productions, whereby they may be able to reduce the facts by him related to the juſt order of time in which they happened. In the preſent caſe, he relates this ſtory of a conſpiracy, as if it had happened in the latter part of his reign (58). Whereas it is certain from Xenophon, who could not be miſtaken in point of fact, that it fell out in the firſt year of his reign: the ſame author has alſo recorded the ſeveral circumſtances attending it, and as ſome of them are extraordinary, the reader will doubtleſs be pleaſed to find them here. On the diſcovery of the plot it appeared, that one Cinado was at the head of the conſpiracy; this Cinado was a young man, very conſpicuous for his valour, though not for his family; the informer likewiſe declared, that this Cinado had once reckoned up forty Spartans, including the kings, the ſenate, and ephori; and that on his demanding what he meant by that calculation, Cinado replied, Theſe are they who are againſt us, the reſt in town and country are of our party. The ephori then demanded of what number the conſpirators conſiſted; the informer replied, they were not many; but that they reckoned upon the aſſiſtance of all the Helotes, the new-made citizens, and the lower ſort of people, who, as often as they ſpoke of the Spartans, intimated as much as if they would be glad to eat them alive. They then demanded if the conſpirators had arms; the informer replied they had, and that Cinado had told him, that in the firſt commotion, workmens tools, or thoſe that belonged to huſbandry, would ſerve their aſſociates well enough, ſince it was not to be ſuppoſed, that they ſhould find their enemies very well armed; being queſtioned to the time, he replied, that he could not tell exactly, but that Cinado had ordered him to hold himſelf ready whenever he ſhould be.

(58) Plutarch. in vit. Lyſand.

were in this ſituation, when Lyſander burning with an impatient deſire of returning again into Aſia, which had been the ſcene of his triumphs, procured ſuch an army to be decreed Ageſilaus, and thereby, as he conceived to himſelf, as would, if no croſs accidents had intervened, have left in all probability no room for Alexander's conqueſts, as Plutarch hath very rightly remarked. Beſides the forces already in Aſia under the command of Dercyllidas, the Spartans voted two thouſand manumitted Helotes and ſix thouſand Peloponneſian foot; but the king after all would not accept the command, till he had a council of thirty aſſigned him, of whom Lyſander was in all reſpects the chief. While the army was drawing together about Geraſtus, Ageſilaus went with ſome friends to Aulis, where the thoughts of his expedition in all probability ſuggeſted to his mind a dream, wherein he was admoniſhed to imitate Agamemnon in ſacrificing, inaſmuch as he was become his ſucceſſor, and was on the point of going general in chief of the Greek forces againſt the Barbarians, an office which had never

be called upon; whence he conjectured, the point of execution was not far off. On the conſideration of theſe things, the ephori were ſo much alarmed on taking this examination, that they were equally afraid to aſſiſt at the ſeſſions of the ſenate, or to aſſemble the people; at length they bethought themſelves of a method of extricating themſelves from the danger: They ſent for Cinado, and told him, that they diſcovered at a town a ſmall diſtance from Sparta contrivances carried on againſt the ſtate, in which a lady of a ſingular beauty and admirable accompliſhments was deeply concerned; they therefore directed him to take a ſmall party of youth, ſuch as he could beſt truſt, and to bring the lady and ſuch others as they gave him a liſt of priſoners to Sparta; the better to colour this buſineſs, they aſſigned him three waggons for his priſoners, and a troop of horſe to eſcort him if he ſhould have occaſion; this troop of horſe, as ſoon as they were at a convenient diſtance from the city, ſurprized him and his companions, and one of them having diſcovered the names of all concerned in the plot, a trooper was ſent back with this information; whereupon the conſpirators were all apprehended, and Cinado upon examination having confeſſed that he had no other cauſe for being diſcontented, than that he diſdained to ſee in a city where he lived any man greater than himſelf, he and his companions were without farther proceſs put to death (59).

(59) Xenophon. Hellen. lib. iii. Polyæn. Strategem. lib. ii. c. 14.

never been borne but by Agamemnon and himſelf; Ageſilaus, in compliance with this viſion, reſolved to ſacrifice; but, reflecting on the barbarity which Agamemnon had been guilty of, he ſubſtituted a hind inſtead of a virgin, and having cauſed it to be crowned with garlands, he directed his own augur to ſolemnize the ſacrifice. The Bæotians hearing of this, and being extremely provoked, that in their territories he ſhould employ one of his attendants inſtead of the ſacrificer appointed by them, ſent deputies to forbid him to ſacrifice in a manner contrary to their laws; which deputies having delivered to him their meſſage in the temple of Aulis, and perceiving that he did not give much heed thereto, they went directly to the altar, and threw the ſacrifice off it on the ground. This may ſeem a circumſtance too trivial for a hiſtory of this nature; but the reader will find hereafter, that it proved the occaſion of a war, which ſubverted the Spartan empire over Greece, and had well nigh deſtroyed her ſtate. At this time Ageſilaus was ſo much diſcompoſed, that he immediately hoiſted ſail and bore away for Aſia, without ſtaying for any other rites, or offering any other ſacrifice[i]. On his arrival he found things in a ſituation he neither expected nor could foreſee; at Sparta he was a king, but here Lyſander was treated as if he had been ſomewhat more; all reſpect, all application was paid to him, and he received it rather with the haughtineſs of a deity, than with that complaiſance which is natural to man; the reſt of the commanders firſt ſtomached it, they grew uneaſy at finding themſelves degraded from being counſellors to Ageſilaus into officers, or rather miniſters, of one of their collegues; they therefore complained to the king, who immediately applied a very quick remedy, which was this; he denied every ſuit that Lyſander made to him, and countenanced all who did not apply to him; which in part had, and in part had not, the deſign he intended; for as ſoon as the Greeks ſettled in Aſia perceived it, they no longer moved their ſuits by Lyſander, but continued notwithſtanding to pay him as much reſpect as before; this nettled the king, though he was not naturally envious, whereupon he appointed this great man overſeer of his proviſions, and to inſult the Ionians, ſaid openly, Let them now go and pay court to my butcher. Lyſander quickly took an opportunity of coming to an eclairciſment; for

[i] Xenophon. lib. iii. Diodor. Sicul. lib. xiv. Plut. in vit Ageſilai. Corn. Nepos, in vit. ejuſdem. Juſtin. lib. vi. c. 2.

for the firſt time they were alone he addreſſed the king thus: In truth, Ageſilaus, you know very well how to leſſen your friends. Yes, anſwered the king, when they affect to be greater than I; nor can it be thought unjuſt that they ſhould have power with me, who moſt concern themſelves in promoting my power. Sir, replied Lyſander very modeſtly, You are pleaſed to exerciſe a greater liberty in ſpeaking than I ever did in acting; but I beſeech you, Sir, for the ſake of thoſe ſtrangers, who have their eyes upon us, to aſſign me that poſt, wherein I may be leaſt ſuſpected by you, and have it moſt in my power to render you ſervice [k]. The king thereupon appointed him embaſſador to the allies of Sparta near the Helleſpont, which office he executed with great diligence and integrity; he perſuaded one Mithridates a Perſian, who was at variance with Pharnabazus, to revolt with a great body of troops and to join Ageſilaus; however, finding the king irreconcileable, he determined with himſelf to return to Greece, highly diſſatisfied with his treatment, and not only ſo, but with the government of his country, which he reſolved to overturn if it was in his power; in order to effect theſe purpoſes, he ſet on foot ſuch ſchemes as are ſcarce to be parallelled in ſtory, but inaſmuch as they were never carried into act, through the cowardice of one of his aſſociates, when they were on the very point of execution, we conceive that entering into a detail of them here would too much interrupt the current of our hiſtory; wherefore we have digeſted what is moſt material in them into a note [l] (P). After his departure, Ageſilaus

[k] Xenophon. ubi ſupra. Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra. Plutarch. in vit. Lyſand. & Ageſil. Corn. Nepos, in vit. Lyſand. [l] Xenophon. Diodor. Plut. ubi ſupra.

(P) During the whole continuance of the Spartan ſtate, there never aroſe therein a greater man, whether we regard his abilities or his fortunes, than Lyſander; how he came to turn thoſe vaſt abilities from the ſervice to the diſſervice of his country, we have explained in the text; the manner in which he conducted his conſpiracy, and with what mighty art he brought it to the very point of execution, will beſt appear from the following account of Plutarch, taken, as he profeſſes, from Ephorus, an author of great eſteem with Strabo and Polybius. "Things had been a great "while ripe for changes, and people were ready to break into re-"bellion; he reſolved therefore not to miſs the opportunity, but "ſet it on foot as ſoon as poſſible. His ſtratagem was this: ſome carried on the war with great success and reputation; Tissaphernes, the implacable enemy of the Greeks, by the intrigues of his enemies, was brought into disgrace with his master,

"of

" of the Heraclidæ, who came into Peloponnesus and mixed with " the Dorians, were now grown very numerous and powerful in " Sparta. Of these two families only could claim any right to " succession in the kingdom, those were the Eurytiontidæ and the " Agiadæ; the rest, notwithstanding their high extraction, had " no greater share in the government than what was common to " the meanest citizen. For they only who could plead most me" rit had the best titles to the common reward of virtue. Lysan-
" der was one of these, and, when he had gained so great a re" putation by his actions, had many friends and much power,
" he was uneasy to see that city, which owed its increase chiefly
" to him, ruled by others no better descended than himself: so he " contrived to alter the settlement which confined the govern" ment to two families only, and give all the Heraclidæ an equal " right to it; nay, some say not to the Heraclidæ only, but to " all the Spartans; and make it a reward, not so much of Her-
" cules's posterity, as of those who bravely imitated that valour
" which gave him a place among the gods. He had great hopes,
" that when the kingdom was thus to be disposed of, no Spartan " could appear with those advantages that he could: Upon which " prospect, first he endeavoured to insinuate the reasonableness of " this change into private people, and learned by heart a fine ora" tion which Cleon of Halicarnassus had made for him upon that " subject. But when he came to reflect on the difficulties of this " undertaking, which was not to be effected by ordinary means,
" he had recourse to extraordinary. For as in tragedies, when " any thing of great importance is to be effected, the assistance of " some god is made use of, so he, to promote his designs with the " colour of authority, had recourse to oracles, presuming he " should prevail upon more citizens by the terror of those, than
" he could persuade by Cleon's eloquence. Ephorus says, that " after he had in vain endeavoured to corrupt the Pythian oracle,
" and as unsuccessfully sent Pericles to corrupt Dodona, he went " himself to Ammon, and proffered the priests prodigious sums of " gold, who with great indignation rejected his bribes, and sent " people to accuse him at Sparta, where he met with such favour" able judges, that he was easily cleared from their impeach-
" ments; upon which the Libyans took their leave of the Spar" tans in this manner; When you come to live among us in Afri" ca, you'll find us more impartial judges. Now there was an
" antient prophecy, which foretold, that the Lacedæmonians " should some time or other inhabit Africa. Lysander's design
" in this matter was very subtle and intricate, and managed by " very maſter, and ſoon after beheaded; Tithrauſtes ſucceeded him; he, as ſoon as he entered on his office, ſent deputies

 to

" very great politicians; ſo in order to clear the whole intrigue, " we muſt trace it, as we do mathematical demonſtrations, up " to its firſt principles; I ſhall the.efore at large explain it as " it is related by Ephorus, a great hiſtorian as well as philoſo- " pher.

" There was a woman in Pontus, who being with child pre- " tended Apollo was the father. Many, with a great deal of rea- " ſon, ſuſpected it, others were ſo credulous as to believe it. " Wherefore when ſhe came to be delivered of a ſon, ſeveral of " the greateſt quality in the country took peculiar care of its edu- " cation, and for ſome reaſon or other gave it the name of Sile- " nus. Lyſander taking hold of this concurrence, made it the " ground of his whole ſtratagem, and choſe ſuch confidents to aſ- " ſiſt him in it, whoſe character might bring the ſtory into repu- " tation without the leaſt ſuſpicion of forgery. To make the beſt " advantage of this ſtory, they ſpread abroad another ſtory, That " there were very antient oracles cloſely concealed in the cuſtody " of the prieſt at Delphi, and it was upon record that they were " not to be profaned by vulgar hands, neither was it lawful for " any man to read them, till in ſome future age one ſhould ariſe, " who could manifeſtly prove himſelf the ſon of Apollo, and chal- " lenge to himſelf the interpretation of theſe myſteries. When " the credit of this report was well eſtabliſhed among the people, " Silenus was to come and demand the prerogative of his birth. " The prieſts, who were confederates in this plot, were ſtrictly " to examine into every circumſtance and particular of his nativi- " ty, and afterwards, being fully convinced that he was the true " ſon of Apollo, were to deliver up their charge to him, and then " the ſon of the god was to unfold in public all thoſe oracles, " eſpecially that, for the ſake of which the whole plot had been " contrived, relating to the government of Sparta, wherein it was " to be declared, That it would be more for the honour and in- " tereſt of Sparta to break the preſent ſucceſſion, and for the fu- " ture chuſe their kings out of the moſt deſerving men in the " commonwealth. But when Silenus was grown up, and every " thing ready for action, the whole buſineſs miſcarried by the " cowardice of one that was an agent in it, whoſe heart failed " him juſt at the time of execution (60) ". Nothing of theſe intrigues was diſcovered during the life-time of Lyſander; but af- ter his demiſe, Ageſilaus being directed to ſearch his papers on ac- count of ſome diſputes with the Argives, he found among them the

(60) Plutarch. in vit. Lyſand. Vid. etiam. Diodor. Sicul. lib. xiv. Corn. Nepos, vit. Lyſand.

to treat with Agesilaus, to whom he proposed, that the Greek cities in Asia should pay the king a certain tribute only, and in all other respects enjoy their liberty, offering him at the same time large sums of money if he would condescend to make a peace, which Agesilaus refused, alledging, that he had not power so to do; however, he removed out of his province, and carried the war into that of Pharnabazus. Tithraustes, who was a man of great parts, when he found the king of Sparta could not be corrupted in Asia, dispatched Timocrates the Rhodian with fifty talents into Greece, to see if any of the captains or statesmen there were less honest than Agesilaus; this agent of his found several such sort of people as he looked for in Thebes, Corinth, and Argos; to them he imparted such sums as he thought proper, and thereby excited a war in the heart of Greece, which no longer left the Spartans at liberty to think of extending their empire beyond it [m]. The Thebans, who of all others came most heartily into this business, saw plainly, that the Lacedæmonians of their own accord would not break with any of the states of Greece; they did not care to act offensively themselves, because the chiefs of the Persian faction were afraid of becoming accountable to the people for the success of the war; they persuaded therefore the Locrians to make an incursion into a small district which lay in dispute between the Phocians and themselves; upon this, as they rightly judged, the Phocians without more ado invaded Locris: the Locrians applied to the oration made by Cleon before-mentioned, which at first he designed to publish in otder to convince the Spartans, who still revered the memory of Lysander, that they had quite mistaken the temper of the man; but Lacratidas, one of the king's friends, gave a noble testimony of his wisdom, by advising Agesilaus to let it alone; he said, it would be dishonourable to disturb the ashes of Lysander, and that with respect to the oration, it would be better to bury it with him, than to trust it abroad in the world; where, considering the force with which it was penned, it might raise a spirit not easy to be laid. Agesilaus on the other hand shewed his wisdom in taking the advice of his friend, and passing by in silence this business which must have produced great mischiefs, had it ever become the subject of debate (61).

[m] Xenophon. Hellen. lib. iv. Diodor. lib. xiv. Plut. in vit. Agesil, & in Apophthegm. Lacon.

(61) Plutarch. in vit. Lysand. & Agesil.

to their allies the Thebans for aſſiſtance, which was readily granted them, and upon this the Phocians addreſſed themſelves to Sparta, ſetting forth that they had not been the aggreſſors, but they had been forced to take arms in defence of their own territories; the Spartans were on their ſide glad of an opportunity of breaking with the Thebans, againſt whom they had long had a grudge; and thus the Perſian talents diſturbed the tranquillity of Greece and put her in a new ferment. Lyſander, though a very old man, grew extremly uneaſy at lying idle, he had beſides a private hatred to the Thebans on account of the aſſiſtance they had given to Athens, at ſuch time as ſhe ſhook off the yoke of the thirty tyrants whom he had eſtabliſhed; he therefore gladly laid hold of this occaſion to perſuade the ephori and ſenate once more to intruſt him with an army. As ſoon as he prevailed in his requeſt, he began to diſpoſe all things for the war; an army was quickly raiſed, at the head of which he put himſelf; another was raiſing, which was to be commanded by king Pauſanias. Lyſander marched with the forces under his command directly into Phocis, deſiring Pauſanias to lead his army round by Cithæron, in order to invade Bœotia on that ſide; the eagerneſs of Lyſander prompted him to quick marches and vigorous meaſures, wherefore, finding Pauſanias loiter, he ſent an expreſs to him who was then encamped at Platæa, with letters, informing him of the time when himſelf expected to arrive at Haliartus, conjuring him to meet him there; theſe letters, Plutarch ſays, was intercepted by the enemy and ſent to Thebes, where the Thebans reſolved to intruſt their city with the Athenians, who were come to their aſſiſtance, and to march directly to Haliartus. Lyſander arrived in the neighbourhood of that city in the night, but when day began to dawn, and he had ſtill no news of Pauſanias, he reſolved at all events to attempt the ſurpriſal of the place; when he drew near the walls and perceived all things quiet, he conceived great hopes; but of a ſudden the gates being thrown open, the Thebans and Haliartans iſſued out in exact order, and charged the Lacedæmonians ſo briſkly, that Lyſander was killed on the ſpot, with a prieſt who ſtood by him, before the forces commanded by him could recover themſelves. Another body of Thebans charged them in the rear, whereby they were totally broken with the loſs of no leſs than a thouſand men, the Thebans on their ſide loſt three hundred [n]. The news of this defeat being brought to Pauſanias, he immediately marched with all poſſible diligence to Haliartus, where he ſought by all means to gain the dead body of Lyſander; ſome of the antient Spartan commanders were for attacking the enemy and recovering it by force; but he, conſidering that they were already flushed with victory, that their troops were more numerous than his, and that Thraſybulus the Athenian had now joined them, refuſed to do it; but on the contrary concluded a treaty, whereby the body of Lyſander was delivered to him, on condition that he retired out of Bœotia, which he accordingly performed, and in his retreat buried the corps of the deceaſed general in the territories of the Panopæans. On his return to Sparta, ſuch a ſpirit of reſentment appeared againſt him, that he was afraid to ſtand his tryal, for which reaſon he retired to Tegæa, where he led a private life. As for Lyſander, his memory was greatly revered in Sparta on account of the mighty ſervices he had rendered his country, and becauſe, after all the opportunities he had had of enriching himſelf, he died miſerably poor, having always preſerved that generous contempt of money inherent to great minds. In his latter years, he is ſaid to have been extremely melancholy, and even peeviſh, which ſome have aſcribed to his natural temper; though that ſeems to be not a little unjuſt, if we conſider that he was now old, and had been extremely ill-treated by Ageſilaus, on whoſe friendſhip he had reckoned ſo much. After his death, ſome Spartans of rank, who were contracted to his daughters, refuſed to eſpouſe them, finding they had no money, for which the ephori fined them, and that very ſeverely, aſſigning this reaſon, that ſuch men muſt be of a flagitious nature, who had rather take a wife out of a wealthy family than a virtuous one [o]. Ageſilaus, having ſubjected the greateſt part of the coaſt, determined with himſelf to march into the heart of Perſia, and to revenge the cruelties perpetrated by Xerxes when he invaded Greece. In the midſt of his projects, and when he was upon the very point of carrying them into execution, a meſſenger from Sparta brought him a ſcytale, ſcytale, whereby he was commanded to return in order to fight his country's battles at home. Ageſilaus heſitated not a moment, he relinquiſhed all his victories and all his hopes, preferring obedience to the conſtitution of Sparta to the proſpect of ſubduing the whole Perſian empire, a conduct which might warrant a long panegyric, if its excellence did not deter us from attempting a theme, which may well be ſuppoſed inexhauſtible, ſince the action of Ageſilaus has hitherto appeared inimitable [p]. The year before the Spartans had declared him admiral as well as generaliſſimo of their forces, which charge he now beſtowed on his wife's brother Piſander, leaving four thouſand men to ſecure his conqueſts, and with the reſt of his army taking the ſame rout which Xerxes had done when he entered Greece. In his paſſage he never demanded any leave from the barbarous nations, but only ſent to enquire of them whether they would have him paſs as an enemy or as a friend; meeting with ſome oppoſition, he engaged the enemy, routed them, and continued his march [q].

[n] Xenophon. Diodor. ubi ſupra. Plut. in vit. Lyſand. Corn. Nepos, in vit. ejuſdem. [o] Xenophon. Diodor. Plut. Corn. Nepos, ubi ſupra.

Ageſipolis ſucceeds his father Pauſanias.

AFTER the flight of Pauſanias, who left behind him two ſons, Ageſipolis and Cleombrotus, the former of them was declared king, but being too young to govern by himſelf, his uncle Ariſtodemus, to whom the Spartans gave the command of a very great army, which they raiſed as well to revenge the death of Lyſander, as to quell in its infancy this dangerous league which was formed againſt them, held the office of protector. This army, when it took the field, conſiſted of fifteen thouſand men; the confederates immediately oppoſed it with another of twenty thouſand, of which thirteen thouſand were heavy armed troops: Near Corinth a battle enſued, wherein the Spartans were victorious with the loſs only of eight men, if we may believe Xenophon, that is, eight of the Spartans; for of their confederates, he acknowledges that a great number fell [r]. News was immediately diſpatched of this victory to Ageſilaus, who, far from being pleaſed therewith, cried out, O Greece, what a number of brave men are ſlain in thy private quarrels, when with a leſs

[p] Xenophon. Diodor. ubi ſupra. Plut. in vit. Ageſil. Corn. Nepos, in vit. ejuſd. Juſtin lib. vi. c. 2. [q] Xenophon Hellen. lib. iv. Diodor. Sicul. lib. xiv. Plut. in vit. Ageſil. & in Apophthegm. Lacon. Corn. Nepos. in vit. Ageſil. [r] Xenophon. ubi ſupra. Diodor. Sicul. ubi. ſupra.

a leſs waſte of blood thou mighteſt have reduced all Perſia[s]! Though theſe were his private ſentiments, yet on his return he obeyed the directions ſent to him by the ephori, and immediately invaded Bœotia contrary to his judgment of things: On the very day he executed this order the ſun was eclipſed, and he received the news of the defeat of the Spartan fleet and the death of his wife's brother Piſander; being afraid this ill news might diſcourage his ſoldiers, he gave out, that the courier had brought him advice of a victory gained by his brother, on account of which he ſacrificed to the gods, and ſent portions of the ſacrifice to his friends, wearing a garland on his head and uſing other teſtimonies of joy, though he acknowledged that Piſander had fallen in the engagement[t]. Not long after an engagement happened in the neighbourhood of Chæonæa, the ſharpeſt which happened in his time, as Xenophon relates; and of this he muſt have been a very good judge, becauſe he was preſent. In this Ageſilaus was the victor where he fought, and the Thebans on the other hand prevailed againſt that wing whereon they charged; Ageſilaus was conſtrained to try his fortune anew againſt theſe: It is generally agreed, that on this occaſion he was guilty of a great overſight in attacking the Thebans in front, when if he had waited a little he might have charged them in flank and rear. Xenophon indeed gives another turn to this matter, for with him Ageſilaus was never wrong; yet it is certain, that the miſtake had like to have been fatal; the Thebans behaving with great reſolution, killing many and wounding more, among whom was Ageſilaus himſelf. At length they marched ſlowly from the field, leaving to the Lacedæmonians the honour of a victory, of which, however, they could collect no fruits[u]. Ageſilaus went to Delphi, where he conſecrated the tenth of his ſpoils, and in the mean time Gylus his lieutenant led the army into Locris, where they were ſo buſy in plundering, that the people ſuddenly roſe upon them, and making a good uſe of their diſorder, killed Gylus and many others. Corinth was the head quarters of the confederates, as Sicyon was of the Lacedæmonians and their allies. At Corinth

[s] Plut. in vit. Ageſil. Corn. Nepos, in vit. ejuſdem. [t] Xenophon. ubi ſupra. [u] Xenophon. ubi ſupra. Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra. Plut. in vit. Ageſil. Corn. Nepos. in vit. ejuſdem.

Corinth there were great ſeditions; many of the citizens, conceiving that they were idly engaged in this war, which tended to bring them under the dominion of the Argives, reſolved, if poſſible, to free themſelves by bringing in a Lacedæmonian garriſon, which in ſome meaſure they effected. The other part in Corinth ſent for aid from Athens, which was readily accorded, and between both parties the city was in the utmoſt danger of being totally ruined [x]. The Spartans had poſſeſſion only of a fort, their enemies had the city; Ageſilaus to put an end to the diſpute invaded the territory of Argos with a great army, and having paſſed through it beſieged Corinth by land, while his brother Teleutias blocked it up by ſea; yet did not their enterprize ſucceed, Iphicrates the Athenian captain preſerving Corinth and its territories from feeling the effects of his reſentment [y]. After his return from this expedition, the Achæans demanded aid of Sparta againſt the Acarnanians, and, according to their requeſt, Ageſilaus was ſent to help them with a great army; he ſo effectually quelled their enemies, that the next year they were glad to make peace [z]. This war over, Ageſipolis at the head of another army entered the country of the Argives, though much againſt his will; for as this people had deſired a truce, he conceived this ſeverity to be a kind of injuſtice, and therefore would not put himſelf at the head of the troops, till he had conſulted the Olympian Jupiter and the Delphian Apollo on this ſcruple of conſcience. Satisfied with the anſwers returned by theſe oracles, he undertook the war, but meeting, or fancying he met, in the courſe thereof many prodigies, he returned without effecting much. In the mean time Conon the Athenian threatened the Spartans with the loſs of their ſovereignty by ſea, wherefore to ſoften the Perſian king, it was reſolved at Sparta to ſend Antalcidas into Perſia to endeavour the withdrawing of the great king from the intereſt of their rivals, though in the mean time preparations were made for carrying on the war in Aſia, in caſe the propoſals he was enabled to offer were refuſed; this was a new method of proceeding unknown in former times to Sparta, and this embaſſador was a perſon who differed much from his fellow citizens, being extremely affable in his manner, [x] Xenophon. ubi ſupra. Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra. Corn. Nepos, in vit. Iphicrat. Polyæn. lib. iii. c. 9. [y] Xenophon. Diodor. Plutarch. Corn. Nepos, & Polyæn. ubi ſupra. [z] Diodor. ubi ſupra. Plut. in vit. Ageſil.

manner, eloquent, and in short every way well accomplished to execute a commission at the Persian court [a] (Q). The

[a] Xenophon. Diodor. ubi supra.

(Q) Antalcidas the son of Leon was a man of great parts, though of no great probity. To gain the confidence of the Persians, he not only fell into their customs, but derided and despised those of his own country; nay, he carried this matter so far, if we may believe Plutarch, that he had the assurance in a wanton dance to mimick Leonidas and Callicratidas, two of the most worthy men in Sparta; this behaviour of his won so much on Artaxerxes, who otherwise had a violent antipathy to the Spartans, and used to call them the most impudent men living; that he sent him from the table where he was sitting a garland dipped in an ointment, which for the extraordinary richness of its composition was used only by the king (62). All which was very agreeable to his own maxim, That the sole means of influencing men is to speak what may delight, and to do what may profit them (63). But though he diverted himself at the expence of his country's customs, he could answer others very tartly who reflected on them; for being asked in a contemptuous manner about the bigness of Sparta and the extent of its dominions, he answered smartly, The walls of Sparta are her youth, and the points of their spears the limits of her territories. An Athenian once bragging in his presence, That his countrymen had often repulsed the Spartans from Cephisus; Very true, replied Antalcidas; but we had never any occasion to drive you from Eurotas. Being desirous to gain admission to the Samothracian mysteries, the priest asked him, Whether he had never done any great crime? If I have, said he, the gods know that already (64). This peace of his was very ill received in Greece by such as piqued themselves on the love of their country; nay, there were many at Sparta itself, who could not forbear expressing their resentment at the abandoning their allies to the mercy of the Barbarians; insomuch, that a person of condition said in the hearing of king Agesilaus, that Greece was now in a lamentable state, since the Spartans themselves began to turn Medes: Say rather, replied the king sharply, That the Medes begin to turn Spartans (65). How little soever Agesilaus approved this peace, he supported it with all his might, and constrained both the Thebans and Argives to accept it much against their wills. On the whole it must be acknowledged, that Antalcidas by his art secured the sovereignty to Sparta, and that she lost it by gratifying her own haughtiness, and her king

(62) Plutarch. in vit. Artaxerx. (63) Plut. in Apophthegm. Lacon. (64) Idem, ibid. (65) Plut. in vit. Agesil.

The Athenians, however, took ſuch meaſures as hindered his ſucceeding immediately. Thimbro, w ho commanded the Lacedæmonian troops in Aſia, for a time did good ſervice, but at laſt was defeated and ſlain ; Teleutias, however, gained ſome advantages at ſea, and having extremely frighted the city of Athens by an attempt on the Pyræum, inclined that city to a peace, to which indeed hardly any of the Grecian ſtates were now averſe. As for Sparta, notwithſtanding her late victories, ſhe found the expence of the war ſo heavy, that it forced her both to wiſh and to ſeek for peace ; the Athenians, terrified with their late loſſes, recollected the fatal iſſue of the Peloponneſian war, and deſired to be rid of this, leſt its end ſhould prove no better ; the Argives, finding that all their artifices would avail no longer, but that the war would find a place in their country as well as elſewhere, wiſhed a general pacification might take place for their own particular intereſt. The Perſian king had alſo his own profit in view, he ſtood in need of Greek mercenaries for carrying on his wars, and theſe were not to be had at a time when Greece ſtood in need of all her ſubjects : He therefore ſignified to Teribazus, who immediately communicated the diſpatches to the Greeks, the terms whereon the king deſired the peace ſhould be made ; they were theſe : That the cities in Aſia, with the iſlands of Clazomene and Cyprus, ſhould remain to him ; that all the other ſtates, ſmall and great, ſhould be left free, except only Lemnos, Imbros, and Scyros, which, having been time immemorial ſubject to the Athenians, ſhould remain ſo ; that ſuch as refuſed to embrace this peace, ſhould be compelled to accept it by force of arms. At firſt the Thebans abſolutely refuſed to comply, becauſe the government of Bœotia was taken from them ; but, Ageſilaus making great preparations to invade them, they in the end were forced to accede ; the Argives too quitted Corinth, to which the exiles returned, and every thing elſe was done which the Spartans deſired. Such was the peace which from its author was ſtiled the peace of Antalcidas, whereby the ſovereignty of Greece indeed was in a manner king Ageſilaus's inveterate hatred againſt the Thebans (66). As to the fate of Antalcidas, we ſhall have occaſion to mention it in the text, and ſhall therefore put an end to this note here.

(66) Xenophon. Hellen. lib. v. Diodor. Sicul. lib. xv.

a manner guarantied to Sparta, but upon very diſhonourable terms; the Greek cities in Aſia being entirely abandoned to the Perſian, notwithſtanding all the promiſes that had been made them, and that Ageſilaus himſelf had fought in their quarrel [b]. This flow of ſucceſs made the Lacedæmonians loſe all temper, inſomuch, that, on the concluſion of the peace, they began to think of puniſhing with ſeverity ſuch as had injured them, or ſuch as they had ſuſpected during the war, as if the dominion of Greece had been a ſmall thing, if their new ſubjects did not feel the preſſure of their government [c]. The firſt who experienced the weight of their reſentment were the Mantineans, though they had heen their confederates and had done them great ſervices. The Spartans, to have a pretence for making war, very modeſtly directed them to quit their city, and to retire into the five villages which had ſerved their foreſathers, where they might be ſure to enjoy peace themſelves, and not give any umbrage to their neighbours; this being refuſed, Ageſipolis was ſent with an army againſt them, for Ageſilaus did not care to command againſt his old friends and acquaintance; Ageſipolis beſieged the city all the ſummer, but when winter drew on, the Lacedæmonians dammed up the current of the river, which thereupon roſe to ſuch a height in the city, as either to overflow, or throw down their houſes, and this compelled the Mantineans to ſubmit to the conditions preſcribed to them by Sparta, and to retire to their old villages from that noble city which they had ſo long enjoyed. The Phliaſians were the next, it was objected to them, that they had exiled ſome of their own citizens who were in the intereſt of Sparta; theſe therefore they were conſtrained to receive again, and to do whatever elſe the Spartans required of them [d]. The Olynthians were in the third place to be chaſtiſed, becauſe they were become powerful; to ſay the truth, there never was a commonwealth which imitated Sparta ſo nearly as did this of Olynthus; for under pretence of freeing the Macedonian cities from the tyranny of Amyntas, they conquered moſt of them and kept them to themſelves; the Acanthians and Apollonians

[b] Xenophon. lib. v. Diodor. lib. xiv. Plut. in vit. Ageſil. & Artaxerx. Corn. Nepos, in vit. Ageſil. [c] Diodor. Sicul. lib. xv. Xenophon. Hellen. lib. v. Plutarch. in vit. Ageſil. Juſtin. lib. vi. c. 6. [d] Diodor. ubi ſupra. Xenophon. ubi ſupra. Plut. in vit. Ageſil. Pauſan. in Lacon.

Apollonians ſignified to the government of Sparta, that in a very ſhort ſpace they muſt be conſtrained either to take arms againſt Olynthus, or ſubmit to her and fight under her banners; Eudamidas was ſent to aſſiſt them with two thouſand men, he marched into Thrace, where he did great ſervice, expecting his brother Phœbidas, who was raiſing a great army and had orders to follow him; but he, paſſing through Thebes, in his march had it betrayed to him by Archias and Leontidas, whereupon he ſeized the citadel called Cadmæa and put a ſtrong garriſon into it; this was an open violation of the peace, and an act in its nature moſt flagrantly unjuſt; yet Ageſilaus protected its author, either from an over-weening paſſion for his own country, or out of an implacable averſion to the Thebans. On his motion therefore Sparta abetted Phœbidas, and transferred the government of Thebes to Archias and Leontidas who had put it into his hands; an act highly diſpleaſing to the Greeks, and made them very apprehenſive of the power of Sparta [e]. Teleutias was ſent to command in Thrace, with ſtrict orders to reduce the Olynthians at all events, which he ſet about ſo eagerly, that going in perſon to the aſſiſtance of ſome of his troops, who were repulſed by the Olynthians, he expoſed his whole army to a great loſs, and was himſelf ſlain upon the ſpot. Ageſipolis, as ſoon as the news reached Lacedæmon, was diſpatched to ſupply his place; he fought with great ſucceſs, reduced Torone, a ſtrong city in thoſe parts, and brought the Olynthians into great ſtreights; but in the midſt of his conqueſt a fever attacked him, and carried him off in a few days. He was a prince of great worth, but of a very mild temper, which gave Ageſilaus room to grow upon him, and to make him ſubſervient to his purpoſes, ſo that he made no great figure in the ſtate; yet he died not unregretted, the people ſorrowing for the loſs of one who always treated them with kindneſs, and Ageſilaus expreſſing great concern for a collegue, with whom he had lived long, and without any difference [f].

Ageſipolis having no children was ſucceeded by his brother Cleombrotus, but he did not ſucceed him in the command

Cleombrotus ſucceeds Ageſipolis.

[e] Diodor. ubi ſupra. Xenophon. ubi ſupra. Plut. in vit. Ageſil. & in vit. Pelop. Corn. Nepos, in vit. Pelop. [f] Diodor. ubi ſupra. Plut. in vit. Ageſil. & Agid. Xenophon, ubi ſupra. Pauſan. in Lacon.

mand of the army, which was intruſted with one Polybiades, who in a ſhort ſpace reduced the Olynthians to ſuch diſtreſs that they were compelled to make a treaty with the Spartans, whereby they undertook to have the ſame friends and enemies with them, and to follow them as aſſociates whitherſoever they ſhould lead them in their wars [g]. The Phliaſians having given ſome new offence, by not treating the exiles whom the Spartans had reſtored with the reſpect which it was thought they deſerved, Ageſilaus marched againſt them with a great army, at which, however, they were not ſo much terrified, but that they made a very vigorous reſiſtance, and defended their city for a very long time; at laſt war and famine brought them ſo low, that they were conſtrained to yield at diſcretion, whereupon commiſſioners were named, part Spartans, part of their own exiles, to determine which of the citizens ſhould have mercy, and which ſhould be put to death. Thus did Sparta govern with pride and cruelty thoſe whom ſhe had moſt unjuſtly brought under her dominion; for by the peace of Antalcidas ſhe had engaged, that all the cities ſhould be left to their freedom. Such Thebans, as could not endure to ſee their country in ſlavery, had privately fled to Athens; but, entertaining a correſpondence in their native country, they found means to be admitted ſecretly, and, having ſtabbed the chief men of the oppoſite party, aſſumed the adminiſtration to themſelves. The Spartans upon this ſent Cleombrotus their new king, at the head of a great army, to reſtore things to their former condition, in which, however, he had no great ſucceſs [h]. At his return he left a garriſon under the command of Sphodrias at Theſpe, as well to encourage the Thebans in the Spartan intereſt, as to awe the adjacent country and lay it under contribution; this Sphodrias, either of his own accord, or, as ſome ſay, prompted thereto by the artifice of the Thebans, attempted to ſeize the Pyræum, which drew the Athenians into the quarrel. Sparta might eaſily have ridded herſelf of this new enemy, if ſhe had acted juſtly, and puniſhed Sphodrias as he deſerved. But here again, king Ageſilaus, being prevailed on by his ſon, interpoſed and protected the criminal; this effectually induced the Athenians to engage in the league formed againſt Sparta: upon which Ageſilaus was forced [g] Diodor. & Xenophon. ubi ſupra.. [h] Diodor. ubi ſupra. Xenophon. ubi ſupra. Plutarch. in vit. Pelopid. Corn. Nepos. in vit. ejuſd.

orced to undertake the command again, though he was now at that age when the law excuſed him; he invaded Bæotia, but with little ſucceſs, Chabrias the Athenian having taught the Thebans to fight in much better order than they had heretofore done. Towards the end of the campaign, Phæbidas, who had been the author of this war, was killed with three hundred horſe; the next year Cleombrotus marched againſt the Bœotians, but the Athenians and Thebans diſputing his paſſage, he was conſtrained to return. At ſea the Spartans were beaten by Timotheus the ſon of Conon, and in ſhort all things began to decline, notwithſtanding the utmoſt care of Ageſilaus, on whom Antalcidas revenged himſelf, for ſome ſmart things he had ſaid of him, when he negotiated the peace in Perſia; for the king returning home wounded by the Thebans, the ſtateſman cried out, You are properly rewarded, Ageſilaus, for teaching theſe Thebans to fight whether they would or no [i]. In the beginning of the hundred and firſt olympiad, Artaxerxes king of Perſia laboured exceedingly in making peace among the Greeks, becauſe, having the reduction of Egypt in his eye, he ſtood in need of their aſſiſtance; in little more than a year he accompliſhed it, if that can be ſaid to be accompliſhed which was of ſo ſhort continuance. The Thebans would never accept the peace, and the reſt of the cities had very little regard to it, ſuch ſeeds of diſcord being now ſown as could not be rooted out. The Lacedæmonians had every-where eſtabliſhed while they were in power an oligarchical government, which in conſequence of this peace being in many places overthrown, the people, as it was natural for them, began to tyrannize over their late maſters, and to treat them with as little juſtice now they were degraded, as they had uſed towards them when in power. The Perſian king ſtill wrought for the bringing about a ſettled tranquillity, which, in the beginning of the hundred and ſecond olympiad, ſeemed to be nearly effected; the Athenians concurring heartily with the Lacedæmonians, and ſhewing no ſort of countenance towards the Thebans, who ſtill refuſed to hear of peace, becauſe the Spartans inſiſted they ſhould ſet the cities of Bœotia at liberty. In this oppoſition they were chiefly encouraged by Epaminondas, who demanded, that before the Lacedæmonians gave laws to others, they ſhould ſhew

[i] Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra. Xenophon, ubi ſupra. Plut. in vit. Ageſil. & in Apophthegm. Lacon. Corn. Nepos, in vit. Ageſil.

a proper regard to these maxims of equity themselves, by giving up Messenia to its antient proprietors and setting Laconia free [k]. This violently incensed Sparta, and at the same time did not a little offend Athens, who could not bear to see the Thebans act independently, who had heretofore either followed their banners, or those of Sparta. Cleombrotus with an army of twelve thousand men was sent into Bœotia; Epaminondas seized the passages through which he intended to have entered, and forced him to march round, which he did, and at length penetrated into Bœotia from the side next Phocis, and advancing towards Leuctra, encamped his army in the plains in that neighbourhood. The Thebans were greatly dispirited at the sight of his numerous army, and the rather, because many evil omens had happened at their marching from home; yet Epaminondas prevailed in a council of war, and carried the question to fight the enemy; in the interim, Jason, a powerful prince of Thessaly, arrived with a thousand horse and fifteen hundred foot, which he brought to assist the Thebans, though on his arrival he strove to make peace, and by his endeavours procured a truce to be actually concluded. As Cleombrotus was about to retire out of Bœotia, he met Archidamus son of Agesilaus, coming with a great reinforcement from Sparta; these princes, without any regard to the truce, resolved to march back to Leuctra in order to fall on the Bœotians, where they found Epaminondas and his troops ready to receive them; that great general, though he knew himself to be inferior to the enemy, resolved to have none to serve under him in the day of battle, who were not thoroughly inclined to conquer; he therefore made proclamation, that all who desired to depart might do so, which permission the Thespians and some others embraced; this done, he disposed his army in battalia, placing all his chosen troops in one wing, and those he least depended on in the other; the former he commanded in person, to the latter he gave directions, that when they found the enemies charge too heavy, they should retire leisurely, so as to expose to them a sloping front. Cleombrotus and Archidamus advanced to the charge with great vigour, but as they pressed on the Theban wing which retired, they gave Epaminondas an opportunity of charging them both in flank and front, which he did with such vigour, that that the Spartans began to give way, eſpecially after Cleombrotus was ſlain, whoſe dead body, however, they recovered; at length they were totally defeated, chiefly by the ſkill and conduct of the Theban general, who did mighty execution upon them, four thouſand being killed on the field of battle, whereas the Thebans did not loſe above three hundred. Such was the fatal battle of Leuctra, wherein the Spartans loſt the empire of Greece, which they had held now near five hundred years [1].

[k] Xenophon. Hellen. lib. vi. Diodor. Sicul. lib. xv. Plut. in vit. Agesil. & Pelopid. Corn. Nepos, in vit. Epamin.

Agesipolis ſucceeds Cleombrotus. Year after the Flood, 2628. Year before Chriſt, 371.

WHEN the ephori had the news of this dreadful and unexpected defeat, they were ſuperintending the Gymnic ſolemnities, and though they evidently ſaw what the conſequences would be of this mighty loſs, yet they did not interrupt or adjourn the feſtival, contenting themſelves with ſending advice to their relations of the names of thoſe who had fallen in the battle. It was at this time that the Spartan virtue ſhone with greateſt luſtre; the fathers, mothers, and thoſe who were neareſt of kin to ſuch as were killed, aſſembled the next morning, ſhook each other by the hand, applauding the courage of their children, while the relations of thoſe who had eſcaped from the battle hid themſelves among the women; or, if they were obliged to go abroad, appeared in tattered cloaths, with their arms folded, and their eyes fixed on the ground. Common people cried out, that now the oracle was accompliſhed, which forbid them to admit of a lame king, ſince under the ſovereignty of Ageſilaus this direful misfortune had overtaken them. However, in regard to his great abilities and the little hopes they had of Ageſipolis the ſon of Cleombrotus, who was a perſon but of very mean parts, they appointed Ageſilaus dictator, or rather legiſlator, giving him a power over the laws, for this reaſon; ſuch as fled from battle were by them degraded from their honours, conſtrained to appear in garments patched with divers colours, to wear their beards half ſhaved, half unſhaved, and to ſuffer any to beat them who pleaſed without reſiſtance; to execute this at preſent was abſolutely inexpedient, power was therefore given to Ageſilaus to new-mold the conſtitution as he thought fit. But that great prince gave on this occaſion ſuch a proof of his wiſdom, as ſhewed he was worthy of the truſt repoſed in him; ſuch a proof as Plutarch confeſſes ſet him above

[1] Xenophon. ubi ſupra. Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra. Plut. in vit. Pelopid. & in vit. Ageſil. Corn. Nepos, in vit. Epaminond. Juſtin. lib. vi. c. 6. Pauſan. Lacon.

comparison, and which indeed can never be sufficiently admired. He came out of the temple very gravely into the public assembly, and by one short sentence restored the public peace, preserved such as were under apprehensions, and at the same time saved the Lycurgic institutes; this sentence runs thus; Let the laws sleep this day, but tomorrow let them resume their full vigour [m]. Then, old and lame as he was, he assembled an army which he led out into the territories of the Arcadians, and purposely avoiding an engagement, after ravaging the country and taking a town or two, he returned home, being content to shew his countrymen that the fortune of Sparta was not entirely lost. Some time after this a peace was concluded; the Mantinæans took this opportunity of rebuilding their city, which exceedingly vexed the Laeedæmonians, who at length not able to contain themselves, invaded them; but the Mantinæans, shutting themselves up in their new city, refused to hazard their safety by a pitched battle. The Arcadians about the same time built the great city of Megalopolis, to which from all their villages they repaired; this too offended the Lacedæmonians, who thereupon invaded Arcadia, and slew Lycomedes the Mantinæan, general of Arcadia, with two hundred men; this broke the spirit of the Arcadians, who thereupon sent to Athens for relief, but being denied there, they made their application to Thebes, from whence Epaminondas and Pelopidas were sent with a great army to their assistance; when they were come into Arcadia, and found themselves at the head of fifty thousand men, they knew not what to do, the enemy being retired; at last it was resolved to invade Laconia, a thing hitherto unattempted; which accordingly they did, and, under the auspice of Epaminondas, appeared before Sparta itself, which then had never heard of war in its neighbourhood; in this desperate situation of things, Agesilaus took the command upon himself, disposing the citizens with such skill, and opposing the enemy where-ever they attempted to enter, with such numbers, that Epaminondas, notwithstanding he greatly desired it, found it impossible to attack the place, but was constrained to retire, wasting the country as he marched off [n]. In the midst of these

[m] Xenophon. ubi supra. Diodor. ubi sup. Plutarch. in vit. Agesil. Corn. Nepos, in vit. ejusd. [n] Xenophon. ubi supra, & in orat. de laud. Agesil. Diodor. Sicul. ubi sup. Plut. in vit. Agesil. & Pelopid. Corn. Nepos, in vit. Agesil. & Epaminond. Pausan. in Lacon. Polyæn. Strategem. lib. ii. c. 3.

theſe misfortunes a very dangerous conſpiracy broke out, two hundred of the rebels ſeizing the temple of Diana at Iſſorion. The Spartans would have immediately attacked them and put them to the ſword, but Ageſilaus, not knowing how far the contagion might reach, prevented them; and having only one ſervant near him, went in perſon to the place, to which when he drew near, he called out, Sirs, you miſtook my orders, I did not direct you to go all in one place, but that ſome of you ſhould go here, and ſome there. The conſpirators hearing this believed they were not diſcovered, and therefore ſeparating immediately went to the poſts which he aſſigned them; thus ſeparated they were eaſily ſeized, and being conducted to examination were afterwards put to death the ſame night, without any reſpect had to the ordinary forms of law. Epaminondas, when he quitted the territories of Sparta, left behind him ſuch a mark of his virtue and magnanimity, as is ſcarce to be parallelled in hiſtory; he rebuilt the city of Meſſene, and recalling the antient inhabitants of Meſſenia from the ſeveral countries where they had taken refuge, he reſtored them to the poſſeſſion of their antient patrimony, after they had loſt it three hundred years. It is remarkable, that theſe Meſſenians, notwithſtanding their diſperſion, preſerved the old Doric dialect, which continued to be ſpoke amongſt them to the times of Pauſanias, the geographer and hiſtorian. When Epaminondas had accompliſhed this, he offered the Lacedæmonians peace, on condition that they quitted all pretenſions to Meſſenia and left Laconia free, which terms were rejected with ſcorn [o]. The preſent diſtreſs of Sparta obliged her to ſue for aſſiſtance to her rival Athens, which, whether from a principle of generoſity or vain glory is uncertain, was readily ſent them under the command of Iphicrates, who in this expedition was ſo unlucky as to loſe a great part of his reputation; the military prudence of Epaminondas putting it out of his power to effect any thing to the prejudice of the army under his command. The next year the war continued with as great warmth as ever, Epaminondas being ſent with a great army to join the Arcadians, Argives, and Eleans, who were in arms in Peloponneſus; the Lacedæmonians in the mean time applied themſelves aſſiduouſly to all the methods that could be devised for restoring their affairs. They sollicited their allies, they manumitted such of the Helotes as were willing to take arms, they sought the assistance of the Athenians, and even of Dionysius the Sicilian, who ordered two thousand Gauls and Spaniards to hold themselves in readiness to be transported into Greece as soon as the season would permit. In the interim, the Lacedæmonian army, consisting of twenty thousand men, fortified the passes at the isthmus, and, having strongly retrenched themselves, determined to abide there, in order to hinder Epaminondas and his Thebans from entering Peloponnesus. But this hope was vain, for though the Theban army was far inferior in number, yet Epaminondas, having considered the extent of their works, and that they were apparently weakest where the Spartans were posted, determined at all events to attack them there, which he did with such vigour, that he forced their lines, and broke into Peloponnesus, where he wasted the country, reduced Sicyon and some other cities, and afterwards marched to Corinth, which he had also taken if it had not been for Chabrias the Athenian, who, being cordially in the interest of Sparta, defended the place so well, that Epaminondas was forced to retire. Here the Gauls and Spaniards, who were by this time come from Sicily, did great service, and in the end of the summer, being bountifully rewarded, returned home [p].

[o] Xenophon. Hellen. lib. vi. Diodor. Sicul. lib. xv. Plut. in vit. Ageſil. & in vit. Pelop. Juſtin. lib. vi. c. 7. Corn. Nepos, in vit. Epamin. Pauſan. in Meſſen. & Lacon.

The Arcadians routed by Archidamus. Year after the flood, 2631. Before Christ 368.

THE Lacedæmonians, though they were still desirous of peace, continued to make as great preparations as possible for supporting the war. Agesilaus assisted them with his counsels; Cleomenes, who succeeded his brother Agesipolis after a year's reign, discharged the functions of first magistrate, Archidamus the son of Agesilaus having the chief command of their armies. In the first year of the hundred and third olympiad, this prince having drawn together a considerable body of Spartans, and their allies, and being assisted by Cissidas general in chief of Dionysius's forces, marched into Arcadia in order to revenge his country for the many inroads, which within a few years before they had suffered from the Arcadians. Having taken Caryæ and put those he took therein to the sword, he projected still greater conquests, till on a sudden all his attempts were checked by a declaration of Cissidas, that, his commission being expired, he could act offensively no longer; in consequence of which declaration he immediately withdrew. But in his retreat, finding finding himſelf in danger of being ſurrounded by the Meſſenians, he ſent to Archidamus to beſeech his aſſiſtance; the Spartan immediately marched with all his forces to the relief of his ally, and on his arrival fell with ſuch vigour on the Arcadians and their allies, that he utterly defeated them with the ſlaughter of no leſs than ten thouſand men, without ſo much as one Spartan heing ſlain; whereby the prediction of the prieſts at Dodona is ſaid to have been fulfilled, they having declared, when Archidamus marched, that this war would end without any mourning of the Lacedæmonians [q]. Some time after this Epaminondas broke in again, notwithſtanding all the care that could be taken, into Peloponneſus, yet without doing any great miſchief; the endeavours of the Perſian king having diſpoſed almoſt all Greece to think of peace, which with much ado was effected, after the Laconian or Bœotic war had laſted about five years, in which if Ageſilaus was to blame, for having through his hatred of the Thebans been a principal author thereof; yet the great ſervices he did his country therein, and his preſerving the city of Sparta from being taken by a numerous and victorious enemy, were ſuch reparations, that we may juſtly commend the Spartans for overlooking the failings of their prince, and making uſe of thoſe high qualities which were alone capable of preſerving them. We have been led to this obſervation from the nature of this hiſtory, which ſhews how ſoon the haughtineſs of any ſtate can raiſe up enemies enough to pull it down, and how far the wiſdom of a ſingle perſon may be capable of conſerving and reſtoring a dejected and defeated nation both to ſpirits and power [r]. In the ſecond year of the hundred and fourth olympiad, there broke out new commotions in Peloponneſus, the Tegetæans and Mantinæans making war on each other; the former requeſting the aid of the Thebans, the latter of the Lacedæmonians and Athenians, gave occaſion thereby to a new and fatal controverſy; for Epaminondas, at the head of a great army marching to the aſſiſtance of his allies, had notice, that Ageſilaus, with the whole power of Sparta, was in full march to join the enemy; whereupon conceiving in himſelf that Sparta muſt be left naked, he directed his march thither with the utmoſt diligence. Xenophon himſelf acknowledges, that this meaſure was ſo well taken, and ſo briſkly

[p] Xenophon. Hellen. lib. vii. Diodor. ubi supra. Corn. Nepos, in vit. Epamin.

[q] Xenophon. ubi ſupra. Diodor. ubi ſupra. Pauſan. in Lacon. Athen. Diepnoſoph. lib. xii. Plut. in vit. Ageſil. [r] Xenophon. ubi ſupra, & in Orat. de Laud. Ageſil. Polyæn. Strat. lib. ii. c. 1. Plut. in vit. Ageſil.

briſkly purſued, that nothing could have prevented his ſurprizing the place; but by accident a perſon gave notice of his march to Ageſilaus, who thereupon diſpatched a courier to Sparta to deſire the citizens to be on their guard; Archidamus no ſooner received his father's diſpatch, than he made all proper diſpoſitions for the defence of the place; the old men and boys he placed on the tops of houſes, that they might incommode the Thebans by throwing tiles and ſtones; ſuch as were capable of bearing arms he poſted in all the avenues of the city, ſo that when Epaminondas came, he had the mortification to ſee that his deſign was diſcovered, and it was impoſſible for him to think of entering without great effuſion of blood; notwithſtanding all this, he attacked the place, but was received ſo warmly that he was obliged to retire; yet Archidamus following him gave an opportunity to the Thebans to revenge the death of their countrymen, which they did by cutting off a great number of Spartans, who had thus needleſly expoſed themſelves by an unwary purſuit. Epaminondas, to make himſelf amends for this ſucceſsleſs attempt, marched directly to ſurprize Mantinæa, which he rightly conjectured would be left naked by Ageſilaus's march to the relief of Sparta. Yet here again an accident defeated all his wiſdom; ſix thouſand Athenian ſuccours were juſt landed in Peloponneſus, and entered Mantinæa the very day that he attacked it. Theſe being freſh and full of ſpirits, had the better of his horſe, and forced him to abandon his deſigns. Theſe miſcarriages ſunk deep into the boſom of this great general, who reflecting that his commiſſion was about to expire, and that, if he retired out of Peloponneſus without effecting any thing, he ſhould not only loſe his own glory, but that authority alſo to which he had raiſed his country; he determined, for the preſervation of both theſe, to riſque a battle at all events. When therefore he underſtood that Ageſilaus at the head of the Lacedæmonians and Arcadians with the reſt of the allies, being no leſs than twenty thouſand foot and two thouſand horſe, were arrived in the neighbourhood of Mantinæa, he led forth his army, and having drawn it up in battalia, marched off towards the hills of Tegea, as if he intended to encamp there; but on a ſudden altering the diſpoſition of his line to give it the form of a wedge, he marched ſuddenly back and fell upon the

[s] Xenophon. ubi ſupra. Diodor. Sicul. ubi ſupra. Plut. in vit. Ageſil. Pauſan Lacon. Corn. Nepos, in vit. Epamin.

the allies, when they expected no ſuch matter; the confuſion was ſo great, that the Thebans would have acquired a very eaſy victory, if Epaminondas, charging the Lacedæmonians, had not expoſed his perſon too much; for they, knowing well that the whole power of Thebes was centered in this ſingle man, covered him with darts, many of which he pulled out of his fleſh, and returned upon thoſe who diſcharged them; at laſt one Anticiates a Spartan ſtruck him into the breaſt with a javelin with ſuch a force, that it broke and left the iron ſticking therein, whereupon he fell down, which occaſioned a new conteſt for his body, and in this with much ado his countrymen were victorious, though with the loſs of their beſt officers. All Greece looked with concern on the iſſue of this buſineſs, which was this; that the contending parties, fearing the continuance of ſo bloody a war, unanimouſly ſtruck up a general peace, excepting only the Lacedæmonians, who at the inſtance of Ageſilaus refuſed to become parties thereto, becauſe the Meſſenians were comprehended therein [t]; for which he is juſtly cenſured by Plutarch, who was likewiſe no leſs diſpleaſed at the laſt actions of his life, which were theſe. Finding that the Perſian was no longer inclined to Sparta, he conſented for the ſake of a large ſubſidy given to his country by Tachos king of Egypt to go in perſon to command the Greek mercenaries he had in his ſervice; there for a time he was of great uſe to the prince, at whoſe requeſt he went into Egypt; but at length, either to gratify his own reſentment, or becauſe he thought it more advantageous to his country, he deſerted him and ſided with his competitor; from whom having received a large ſum of money for his good ſervices, he embarked in order to return into Peloponneſus; but being by contrary winds forced on the African ſhore, he died after a ſhort illneſs, rather of age and fatigue than of any other diſtempers, when he had attained the eighty-fourth year of his life, and had reigned forty-one years, leaving behind him the character of a wiſe prince, a great captain, and a paſſionate lover of his country [u] (R).

ARCHI.

[t] Xenophon. Hellen. lib. viii. Diodor Sicul. lib. xv. Plut in vit. Ageſil. Juſtin. lib. vi. c. 7. Corn. Nepos in vit. Epamin.
[u] Xenophon. ubi ſupra. & in Orat. de laud. Ageſil. Diodor. ubi ſupra. Plut. in vit. Ageſil.

(R) If it may be juſtly eſteemed a happineſs to a great king to have his actions recorded by writers of eminent abilities, no prince

of Archidamus succeeds Agesipolis. Year after the Flood, 2637. Before Christ 362.

ARCHIDAMUS succeeded to his father Agesilaus; he was become the darling of the people for the glorious victory of Greece ever was happier in this respect than Agesilaus: Xenophon, the best historian of his age and the companion of Agesilaus's labours, was likewise the compiler of them. His Grecian history contains a very particular narration of the king's exploits, and his oration in praise of Agesilaus is a panegyric worthy of the character of that prince and of its writer. Diodorus the Sicilian hath also a very copious account of the transactions of this king of Sparta; besides which and the transcripts that have been made from antient Greek writers by translators and epitomizers, we have his life written by Plutarch, and again by Cornelius Nepos. His expedition into Egypt, when he was eighty years old and upwards, is to be the subject of this note; this let us take from Plutarch, who hath given us the detail of this expedition with peculiar exactness. "As soon as he arrived in Egypt all the great "officers of the kingdom came to pay their compliments to him "at his landing; his reputation being so great had raised the ex"pectation of the whole country which did flock in to see him; "but when they found, instead of the great prince whom they "looked for, a little old man of contemptible presence, without "all ceremony lying down upon the grass, his hair uncombed, "and his cloaths thread-bare, they fell into a laughter and scorn "of him, crying out, that the old proverb was now made good, "The mountain had brought forth a mouse. They were much "scandalized at his insensibility and rudeness (as they thought it), "who when the presents, usually offered to strangers of distinc"on, were made him of all manner of provisions, took only the "meal, the calves, and the geese, but rejected the sweet-meats, "the confections, and perfumes; and when they did urge him to "the acceptance of them, he said, They might carry them to "his slaves the Helotes. Theophrastus saith, that he was taken "with nothing he saw in Egypt so much as with the Papyrus, so "proper for garlands by reason of the smoothness and pliantness "of its rind; and when he left Egypt, he desired the king to "let him carry some of it home with him. When he joined "with Tachos, he found his expectation of being generalissimo "frustrated: Tachos reserved that place for himself, making "Agesilaus only captain of the band of mercenaries, and Cha"brias, the Athenian, admiral. This was the first occasion of "his discontent; but there followed others: He being daily "tried with the insolence and vanity of this Egyptian, was at "length forced to attend on him into Phœnicia, in a condition "much below his spirit and dignity, which, notwithstanding, he "was obliged to digest for a while, till he had an opportunity of victory he had obtained over the Arcadians, and which, becauſe no Spartan fell therein, they tranſmitted to poſterity

"shewing

" ſhewing his reſentment. It was ſoon afforded him by Nectana-
" bis, Tachos's own nephew and a great captain under him,
" who took an occaſion to fall off from his uncle, and was pro" claimed king by the Egyptians. This man invited Ageſilaus to " his party, and the like he did to Chabrias, offering great re" wards to both. Tachos had quickly intelligence of this, and " had then recourſe to all the ſubmiſſive methods he could think " of, in order to engage both Ageſilaus and Chabrias to his inte" reſt; the latter readily yielded to his entreaties, and endea" voured all he could to perſuade Ageſilaus, but he pretended
" to depend wholly on the orders which ſhould be ſent him from " Sparta, whither both the Egyptian princes had diſpatched em" baſſadors. The Lacedæmonians left the whole matter to Age" ſilaus, directing him to what was moſt for the profit of the " commonwealth; whereupon he immediately changed ſides and " carried off all the mercenaries with him. He had not been long
" in the ſervice of Nectanabis before a certain Mendeſian ſet up " his claim to the Egyptian kingdom, and brought a hundred
" thouſand men at his heels to ſupport it. He attempted to " tamper with Ageſilaus, of which Nectanabis having notice be" gan to ſuſpect him, and his ſuſpicion encreaſed when Ageſilaus
" adviſed him to fight this multitude immediately; he took quite " a different method, retiring into a ſtrong city, and ſhutting up
" himſelf and his troops therein, the Mendeſian advancing in-
" veſted the place immediately, and began to ſink a ditch, and " throw up intrenchments all round the place. Nectanabis all
" on a ſudden talked of fighting, being afraid of being cooped
" up, and ſtarved out; but Ageſilaus oppoſed it, for which the " Greeks blamed him, and the Egyptians called him traitor;
" but he bore all with patience being aſhamed of changing ſides
" a ſecond time. At laſt, when the enemy had almoſt perfected
" their works and only a narrow aperture was left, Ageſilaus
" went to Nectanabis and addreſſed him thus: Now, young " man, you have an opportunity of ſaving yourſelf: your ene" mies have been all this time working for you; if you iſſue out " with your forces, you will eaſily beat thoſe who guard the " gap which is yet open; and as for the reſt, their own works " will hinder them from ſurrounding us. Nectanabis, admiring " his wiſdom, exactly followed his advice, by which means he " routed his competitor, and leaving the conduct of the war for " the future to Ageſilaus, he quickly ſubdued all his enemies, " and ſettled him firmly on the throne. After this being eagerly de" ſirous of doing ſtill ſomething more for the ſervice of his coun" try, the king of Sparta embarked in order to return to Greece, " carrying

terity by the name of the tearleſs battle. In his reign broke out the Phocian, or ſacred war, wherein he ſided with the Phocians at the perſuaſion, as ſome writers ſay, of his wife Dinicha. Others affirm, that not only his wife and himſelf were wrought on by the bribes of the Phocians, but even the ephori, the ſenate, and the whole republic of Sparta; but though he eſpouſed their quarrel, yet he was far from countenancing their cruelty, which on the contrary he openly condemned and oppoſed. When Philip king of Macedon began to intereſt himſelf much in the affairs of Greece, and to take highly upon him for the many victories he had gained, Archidamus is ſaid to have ſent him this meſſage; Sir, If you will be pleaſed to meaſure your ſhadow, you won't find it a whit longer than it was before. He was by no means pleaſed with the cuſtoms of his country, but on the contrary thought them burthenſome and rigorous, affecting to live freely and without reſtraint, ſuppoſing, that it did not at all affect a man's honeſty, if he eat a good dinner: For this reaſon he was glad of an opportunity to leave Sparta, and of reſiding in a foreign country, where he might live as he would, without offending the laws or giving ſcandal to his ſubjects; the Tarentines therefore requeſting aid of the Lacedæmonians for their ſupport againſt their neighbours, Archidamus very readily offered to command the forces that were decreed them, and paſſing on this occaſion over into Italy, he was there ſlain near the city of Mandonium after having reigned fifteen years; his ſtatue was erected at the temple of Jupiter Olympus, an honour which none of the Spartan kings had done them except himſelf; which Pauſanias ſuppoſes was conceded to him, becauſe he died fighting againſt the Barbarians, and did not receive thoſe

" carrying with him among other rich preſents a gratuity of two " hundred and thirty talents, as a free gift from Nectanabis to " the ſtate of Sparta. In this voyage he died, and for want of " honey, which the Spartans were wont to uſe in embalming, " his ſervants wrapped his body in wax, and brought it ſafe to " Sparta". Xenophon has taken much pains to vindicate even his deſerting Tachos, which Plutarch juſtly treats as an act of treachery, proceeding, as he tells us plainly, from the Spartan maxim, that all things are juſt that are profitable to one's country (67).

(67) Plutarch. in vit. Ageſil.

thoſe ſepulchral honours which had been given to all his predeceſſors [x].

Agis ſucceeds Archidamus. Year after the Flood, 2653. Before Chriſt, 346.

Agis the ſon of Archidamus ſucceeded his father; he was a prince of great virtue and magnanimity; he in his youth had been ſent embaſſador to Philip of Macedon, who ſeeing him alone, whereas all other cities ſent many deputies, ſaid with an air of contempt, What! from Sparta but one? Why, Sir, ſaid Agis, I was ſent but to one [y]. When afterwards one of the creatures of that prince told him, Philip will not ſuffer you to ſet your foot in any other part of Greece. It is a mercy, ſaid he, that we have a good deal of room at home [z]. During the reign of Alexander, tho' he hated the Macedonians, yet he did not think fit to expoſe his country to ruin by oppoſing them; but when after the battle of Iſſus abundance of mercenaries fled out of Perſia, he liſted them to the number of eight thouſand, and openly declared for Darius; from whom receiving money to pay his troops and a fleet, he ſailed over into Crete, part of which he ſubdued. After the battle of Arbela he ſtirred up all Greece to revolt, by ſhewing them, that, when Alexander had ſubdued Perſia, they muſt become a province of his empire, which would be no leſs grievous to them, than if they had been ſubdued by any of the former kings of Perſia; for, as he rightly obſerved, a Grecian king reigning in Perſia would be a Perſian to them; beſides, having been always free, he encouraged them to defend their freedom, while their capital enemy was yet afar off, and would be conſtrained to manage the war by his lieutenants. The Greeks, rouſed by theſe remonſtrances, raiſed an army of twenty thouſand foot and two thouſand horſe, of which when Antipater had notice, he compoſed on any terms the diſturbances in Thrace, and marched ſtrait into Greece with forty thouſand men. Agis, however, did not retire or ſhun an engagement, ſo that a deciſive battle was quickly fought, wherein, after a glorious reſiſtance, the Spartans and their confederates were routed with the loſs of five thouſand three hundred men, Antipater loſing three thouſand five hundred alſo. Agis himſelf fell, but in a manner greatly to his honour; for being covered with wounds he was borne by his ſoldiers out of the battle, till ſeeing them on the point of being ſurrounded, he commanded manded them to set him down, and preserve themselves for the future service of their country; remaining then alone with his sword in his hand, he fought it out upon his knees, killing several of the Macedonians, till at last he was shot through the body with a dart [a]. Such was the glorious death of this most virtuous king, who died in defence of liberty and his country after a reign of nine years. Yet when Alexander heard of this engagement, he was vain enough to say, While we are fighting Darius in Asia, there has been it seems a battle of mice in Arcadia [b]!

[x] Diod. Sicul. lib. xvi. Strabon. Geogr. lib. vi. Plut. Apophtheg. Lacon. Pauſan. Lacon. & Meſſen. Julian. Orat. ii. [y] Plut. Apophthegm. Lacon. [z] Idem ibid.

Eudámidas succeeds Agis. Year after the Flood, 2669. Before Christ, 330.

AGIS was succeeded by his son Eudamidas, a prince of great wisdom, moderation, and gentleness; he governed all his days in peace, and we have of consequence nothing of him on record, except certain instances of his good sense and great capacity for governing in those troublesome times wherein he lived. The death of Agis had so much provoked the Lacedæmonians, that they were for carrying on a war against Macedon at all events, which Eudamidas opposed; and when a certain Spartan addressed him thus, Why, Sir, when all your citizens are for a war, do you alone advise them to continue in peace? Because, answered the king, I would convince them of their mistake. Another magnifying the victories which had been obtained by their ancestors against the Persians, and encouraging them from thence to undertake a war against Macedon, You think, Sir, said Eudamidas, that it is the same thing to make war against a thousand sheep and against fifty wolves. Coming into the school of Xenocrates the philosopher, and observing that he was very old, he asked what was his profession, and some body answering that he was a wise man who sought after virtue, Alas! said he, Is he seeking it at these years? When then will he make use of it? When Alexander caused it to be proclaimed throughout Greece, that all the exiles should return in safety to their own cities, excepting those of Thebes; This is a hard case, O ye Thebans, said Eudamidas, but at the same time very honourable; for it is evident, that Alexander fears you only of all the Greeks [c]. All these kings had for their colleague Cleomenes the son of Cleombrotus, who reigned very very long, but without doing any thing that was remarkable.

[a] Diodor. Sicul. lib. xviii. Curt. lib. vi. Justin. lib. xii. Strab. lib. viii. Pausan. Attic. [b] Diodor. lib. xviii. [c] Plut. Apophthegm. Lacon. Pausan. Lacon.

Archidamus and Areus kings of Sparta.

ARCHIDAMUS ſucceeded his father Eudamidas, as Areus the ſon of Acrotatus did his grandfather Cleomenes, but not without ſome diſpute; his uncle Cleonymus ſetting up a title to the throne, though the people preferred the ſon of the elder brother to the younger. Cleonymus, however, retired to Pyrrhus, whom he brought with an army into his country to abett his cauſe, notwithſtanding that the ephori and ſenate would have granted him any reaſonable terms he could have aſked. The Spartans ſent Dercyllidas to meet him on the frontiers, and to expoſtulate with him on the injuſtice of his invaſion; but Pyrrhus by one of his courtiers bid him carry this meſſage to Sparta, that they ſhould receive their king Cleonymus, or he would make them know that they were no better than other men. Sir, anſwered Dercyllidas, If your maſter is a god, we do not fear him, becauſe we have done no wrong; and if he is a man we do not fear him, becauſe we are as good as he [d]. This expedition had well nigh accompliſhed the ruin of Sparta, occaſioning much more loſs thereto than either of the attempts of Epaminondas. It is our duty therefore to enter into a diſtinct detail thereof. Pyrrhus had with him twenty thouſand foot, two thouſand horſe, and twenty-four elephants. Areus was at this time in Crete, and the city was chiefly intruſted to the care of his ſon Acrotatus, whoſe amours had in a great meaſure occaſioned this war; for he had debauched Chelidonis the wife of Cleonymus his uncle, which was one great reaſon of his flying to Pyrrhus, whom he accompanied in this expedition. When they arrived in the neighbourhood of Sparta, which was very unexpected, the citizens flattering themſelves that their embaſſadors would have obtained peace, certain intelligence was brought to the king, that the city was ſo meanly provided, and the people ſo much amazed, that without queſtion it would fall almoſt without trouble into his hands. When this news came it was almoſt evening, yet Cleonymus preſſed hard for their marching thither that night; but the king, fearing that the darkneſs would afford an opportunity to the ſoldiers of poſſeſſing themſelves of all the riches of Sparta, refuſed to attack it till day-light; day-light; a thing so little expected even by the Spartans themselves, that in Cleonymus's house the Helotes were busy in providing a supper, not doubting, but Pyrrhus would take up his lodgings there. But when it was known, that his soldiers had pitched their camp near the walls, the senate assembled to consider if any thing could be done for their preservation; and the first resolution they came to was, to send the women immediately over into Crete, which resolution some way taking wind, the Spartan ladies assembled together, and having deputed Archidamia to carry their sentiments to the senate, she entered the room with a sword in her hand, addressing the assembly in these words: Do not, my lords, entertain so mean an opinion of the Spartan women, as to fancy that they will ever out-live Sparta; instead of considering whither we are to fly, consider what we are to do, and be assured we will undertake any thing for the service of our country [e]. Upon this it was resolved to sink a trench directly opposite to the enemies camp, and to defend the extremities thereof by burying waggons to their axle-trees, crossing each other, in order thereby to prevent the passages of the elephants. When this work was begun, the women came out many of them in their shifts to assist the men in years who were employed in digging; for they would not allow any of the young men to fatigue themselves, lest they should be unable to sustain the enemies charge in the morning. The dimensions of the trench once settled, which, some tell us, were these, viz. the breadth six cubits, the depth four, and the length eight hundred feet; the women took a third part of it and engaged to finish it by morning [f]. When day began to break, and the troops of Pyrrhus were in motion, the Lacedæmonian ladies armed their men for the fight, representing to them, as they were buckling their armour and putting their spears into their hands, how glorious an opportunity they had of conquering the enemies of their country in the sight of their mothers, wives, and daughters, or of falling in its cause. As for Chelidonis, she retired to her own house with a halter about her neck, to shew, that if things went amiss, she would rather end her own life, than live again with her husband. Pyrrhus saw with amazement the labour his troops were to undergo; however, he led them in person to the assault, where they fought with the utmost fury against the Spartans, who, considering for what they fought, made a most desperate

[d] Plut. Apophthegm.

[e] Plutarch. in vit. Pyrrh. [f] Justin. lib. xxv. c. 4.

deſperate reſiſtance; in the mean time Ptolemy the ſon of Pyrrhus drew off two thouſand Gauls and other choice men from the attack, and, marching to one of the extremities of the ditch, employed them in dragging out the waggons, which at laſt with much ado they effected, and began to draw them off towards a neighbouring river. Acrotatus was the firſt who perceived this deſperate miſchief, which he immediately ſought to remedy; for ruſhing through the city with three hundred men, he paſſed round by the ſides of the hills and charged Ptolemy's troops in the rear, who thinking of nothing leſs and being in no poſture of defence, he forced numbers of them into the ditch, and drove the waggons they had removed over the reſt to the great joy of the Spartans; where Pyrrhus charged in perſon, the attack was ſuſtained with greateſt vigour, and one Phyllius a Spartan gave ſuch a demonſtration of invincible courage as is ſcarce any where to be recorded; he fought in the front of his countrymen's ranks, till he found himſelf ſo exhauſted through the many wounds he had received, that he was no longer able to ſtand; when he called to the commanding officer, and having reſigned to him his poſt, retired as far back as he could, that his body might be out of the reach of the enemy when he fell. The battle, as it began with the day, ſo it ended therewith, and Pyrrhus being extremely fatigued retired to his tent, where he ſlept very ſoundly till towards morning, when he had the following dream: He thought he ſaw himſelf throwing lightning on Sparta which ſet it all on fire, with the joy of which he awaked; he immediately ran to his council of officers, and communicated to them his viſion; but Lyſimachus his favourite did not underſtand the viſion in the ſame light with the king; Thou knoweſt, Pyrrhus, ſaid he, that with us places ſtricken with lightening are accounted ſacred; I am therefore of opinion, that the gods have hereby ſignified to thee, that Sparta is as ſacred and inviolable as a place ſtricken with lightening; Well, replied Pyrrhus, I am ready to own, my friend, that nothing can be more uncertain than our conjectures concerning theſe things; yet this remains certain ſtill, that we ought to do our duty; and therefore, without thinking more of my dream, let us prepare for the attack [g]. The aſſault was no leſs vigorous than the day before, nor did the Lacedæmonians defend themſelves with leſs vigour, the women remaining all day at the trench

[g] Plutarch. in vit. Pyrrh.

ſupplying the ſoldiers with arms, ammunition, meat, drink, and whatever elſe they wanted, binding up their wounds, and carrying them off in caſe they were diſabled; at laſt, however, Pyrrhus prevailed in the very attempt his ſon had miſcarried in the day before, and of a ſudden appeared within the waggons, charging at the head of a great number of horſe with mighty reſolution. In vain the Lacedæmonians crowded from all ſides to impede his paſſage; they were trodden down by his horſe, and Pyrrhus was on the very point of entering the city when an arrow ſtruck his ſteed to the heart; the beaſt, flouncing in the agonies of death, threw him off, and his ſoldiers in the firſt confuſion, not knowing whether he as well as his horſe was not ſlain, gave back; upon which the Spartans preſſed on them ſo eagerly, and diſtributed their darts with ſuch ſucceſs, that when Pyrrhus was remounted he thought it beſt to retire, ſuppoſing that the third day would put an end to this conteſt, when after the heat of the action the Spartans had leiſure to feel their wounds; nor would he in all probability have been miſtaken, if he had dealt the next day with none but thoſe whom he engaged before. The good fortune of Sparta prevented this; for one of Antigonus's captains, having intelligence of their diſtreſs and of the noble ſtand they had made, adventured with a body of troops under his command to throw himſelf into the place, where he was ſcarce arrived before king Areus himſelf entered with two thouſand freſh men. Pyrrhus notwithſtanding aſſaulted the place the third time, but with little ſucceſs; whereupon he embraced an invitation given him to march to Argos, and endeavoured to rid himſelf of this unlucky buſineſs as well as he could; yet here again he found himſelf diſtreſſed, for king Areus being once come did not care to part with him ſo, but ſent a choice body of horſe to infeſt his rear. The king, vexed at this inſult, ordered his ſon Ptolemy with ſome ſquadrons under his command to march to the aſſiſtance of the troops attacked, where the young prince, more ambitious of glory than careful of life, expoſing himſelf too much was ſlain. Pyrrhus when he heard the news immediately jumped on horſeback, and charging with unwonted fury the Lacedæmonians, ſlew many of them, and particularly their commander in chief, with his own hand; he afterwards quitted his horſe and fought on foot, and when he had ſatiated himſelf with deſtroying numbers of the Spartans, he continued his march to Argos [h]. Areus is very much blamed for his conduct on this occasion: it is said, that when Pyrrhus was retired, pursuing him was needless, and served only to throw away the lives of many brave men; but it seems the Spartan king was of opinion, that no safety could be hoped for till Pyrrhus was out of Greece; for this reason he posted away in person to Argos with a thousand choice foot, and yet he scarce arrived time enough there to save the city, a gate of which having been perfidiously opened to Pyrrhus in the night, he entered it before the citizens were aware; however, they stood to their arms, and while they were hotly engaged with the enemy, Areus came to their aid; Pyrrhus at last perceiving that he fought under great disadvantages would have retreated; but his orders being mistaken, and his forces and elephants still continuing to enter the city, he was at last beat from his horse by a woman, who, standing on the top of her house and perceiving him about to push his horse upon her son, discharged a thick tile at his head, which struck him on the temple, took from him his senses, and before he could recover them an officer of Antigonus's army struck off his head [i]. Concerning this Areus we know nothing of him farther than that he was a zealous defender of the liberties of Greece, as far as the broken and distressed state of his country would give him leave; for when he understood, that Athens was in danger of being oppressed by Demetrius the son of Antigonus, he generously armed in its defence, and was slain valiantly fighting at the battle of Corinth [k]. To this prince the best critics have referred that letter to Onias the high priest, which we find recorded in the book of Maccabees [l] (S).

[h] Justin. lib. xxv. c. 5. [i] Justin. Hist. lib. xxv. c. 5. Pausan. in Argol. Plut. in vit. Pyrrh. [k] Plut. in vit. Demetr. [l] 1 Maccab. xii. 20. Joseph. Antiq. Judaic. lib. xii. c. 5.

(S) The letter above referred to runs thus:

Areus king of the Lacedæmonians to Onias the high priest, greeting;

It is found in writing, that the Lacedæmonians and Jews are brethren, and that they are of the stock of Abraham: Now therefore, since this is come to our knowledge, you shall do well to write to us of your peace (69). This letter is actually in the Laconic stile, and deserves therefore to be preferred to that which we (69) 1 Maccab. xii. 20.

He was ſucceeded in his throne by his ſon Acrotatus, who had ſo valiantly defended Sparta when attacked by Pyrrhus.

The Acts of Archidamus IV. king of Sparta.

Of the other houſe Archidamus the fourth of that name, the ſon of Eudamidas, governed with great reputation; he was a prince of the true Spartan race, who was deſirous to maintain all Greece in freedom, and to repreſs, if we find in Joſephus, wherein Demoteles is named as embaſſador from Sparta; the form of the letter is ſaid to be ſquare, and the common ſeal of Lacedæmon is deſcribed as having repreſented thereon an eagle holding a dragon. The learned primate of Ireland hath been led into a great miſtake by paying too much regard to this Jewiſh writer; for it is certain, that this letter could never have been ſent to Onias the third of that name, high-prieſt of the Jews, who flouriſhed when there were no kings at all at Sparta; this the learned Prelate was ſo well aware of, that to get over theſe difficulties, he ſuppoſes one Areus a nobleman of Sparta to have taken the title of king in the penning of this epiſtle (70); but here again is a new and greater difficulty incurred than the former; Jonathan in his letter to the Lacedæmonians, ſpeaking of the epiſtle before us, ſays it was wrote a long time ago, which no way quadrates with the time in which Joſephus and archbiſhop Uſher place it; the truth is, this letter was not written to Onias the ſon of Simon, but to Onias the firſt, who was undeniably cotemporary with this king Areus, of whom we have treated in the text. In this we have followed the opinion of the judicious Dr. Prideaux (71). We take the liberty of adding, that there is the more reaſon to ſuſpect ſome alteration in this letter by Joſephus, becauſe when he comes to give us Jonathan's letter, he has taken the liberty to alter its addreſs alſo, and not at all for the better: thus it runs according to Joſephus: Jonathan, high prieſt of the Jews, and the ſenate, and commonalty of the Jews, to the ephori, ſenate, and people of the Lacedæmonians greeting (72). Whereas in the book of Maccabees the addreſs is thus: Jonathan the high prieſt, and the elders of the nation, and the prieſts, and the other people of the Jews, unto the Lacedæmonians their brethren ſend greeting (73). Neither ephori or ſenate are mentioned here; they were probably put in by Joſephus to make the letter look the better. The name of Demoteles is alſo inſerted in this letter, though we find nothing of it in the letter recorded by the author of the book of Maccabees. How the Spartans and the Jews came to be related, muſt be conſidered in another place; our buſineſs here was to fix the time when the letter from Areus was ſent to Onias.

(70) Uſſer. Annal. V. T. A. I. P. 4531. (71) Connection of the hiſtory of the Old and New Teſtament, Part ii. Book II. (72) Antiq. Judaic. lib. xiii. c. 5. (73) 1 Macc. xii. 6.

if it had been poſſible, the mighty power of the Macedonian kings, which like a torrent ſwept all before them; and though for a time they might be reſtrained from doing much miſchief, by their being obliged to turn their arms elſewhere, yet, whenever they had leiſure, they were ſure to ſeek ſuch an authority in Greece as ſuited not with her liberty. Archidamus had ſtruggled againſt the ſtream when it was moſt rapid, that is, when Demetrius Poliorcetes after ſubduing Athens, ſought to make himſelf maſter of Sparta; twice Archidamus oppoſed him in the field, but was ſo unfortunate as to be as often defeated, nor could any thing have ſaved the virgin city of Sparta from the rage of the victor, if the declenſion of his affairs in Aſia had not conſtrained him for a time to abandon all thoughts of Greece [m]. He was ſucceeded by his ſon, but how long he reigned, or at what age he died, is uncertain.

EUDAMIDAS the ſon of Archidamus was the collegue of Acrotatus, he married Ageſiſtrata, by whom he had two ſons, Agis and Archidamus [n]. As to his acts, we find no mention of them in hiſtory: It is probable, that, being a man of ſmall parts, the government reſted chiefly in Acrotatus, who could not but be highly beloved by the people on account of his great valour and many virtues. Ariſtodemus, who had made himſelf prince of Megalopolis, was the capital enemy of the Lacedæmonians, ſeeking by all means to abaſe a nation who were always ready to take arms for liberty, and who alike hated the oppreſſion of tyrants themſelves, or to ſee their neighbours oppreſſed by them. Acrotatus, at the head of the Lacedæmonian army, endeavoured to make head againſt this prince, who was grown formidable to all Peloponneſus; but, his fortune being no way equal to his merit, his forces were routed, and himſelf ſlain, leaving the kingdom to his young ſon Areus, to whom Leonidas the ſon of Cleonymus was tutor or protector; and he dying after a very ſhort reign, Leonidas ſtept into the throne in his own right [o].

Eudamidas ſucceeds his father Archidamus.

LEONIDAS had been bred up, or at leaſt had long lived, in the court of Seleucus, which made him extremely fond of that pomp and grandeur which he ſaw affected there; at Sparta he had a great opportunity of indulging his ambition and luxury, the people being greatly altered from what they were before, and the Lycurgic maxims grown not only into diſſuetude, but contempt. One Opytadeus, being raiſed to a chair among the ephori, took occaſion from thence to gratify his unnatural prejudice againſt his own ſon, and procured a law, whereby all men were left at liberty to diſpoſe of their lands by gift or ſale, or by teſtament at the time of their deceaſe. This ſubverted the very foundations of the ſtate, for by degrees the lands were moſt of them transferred from the antient Spartan families, ſo that though they were reduced now to about ſeven hundred, not above one hundred of theſe had any lands, but lived in the city lazily, without employment, and without wealth, their ſpirits ſinking with their fortune, and with both the credit and glory of the Spartan ſtate [p].

Leonidas ſucceeds his pupil in the throne of Sparta.

[m] Plutarch. ubi ſupra. [n] Plutarch. in vit. Agid. [o] Plutarch. ubi ſupra. & in vit. Cleomen.

Agis the ſon of Eudamidas attempts to reſtore the conſtitution of Sparta.

THE collegue of Leonidas of the other houſe was Agis, the ſon of Eudamidas, a young prince of great hopes; he ſhewed himſelf both juſt and obliging to all men, and in the gentleneſs of his diſpoſition, and ſublimity of his virtues not only exceeded Leonidas who reigned with him, but all the kings of Sparta from king Ageſilaus. For though he had been bred very tenderly, and in abundance of all things by his mother Ageſiſtrata and his grandmother Archidamia, who were the wealthieſt of the Lacedæmonians; yet, before the age of twenty, he ſo far overcame himſelf as to renounce effeminate pleaſures. He was a very handſome perſon and of a graceful behaviour; yet, to give a check to the vanity he might take therein, would always go plain and mean in his cloaths. In his diet, bathings, and in all his exerciſes he choſe to imitate the old Laconic frugality and temperance, and was often heard to ſay, He would not deſire the kingdom, if he did not hope by means of that authority to reſtore their antient laws and diſcipline. This maxim of his governed his whole life; he endeavoured to aſſociate himſelf with men of intereſt and capacity, ſufficient to bring about the great deſign he had formed of thoroughly reforming the ſtate. Ageſilaus, his uncle by the mother's ſide, was one of his principal counſellors, a man of great eloquence but no great virtue; the part he took in this buſineſs being chiefly owing to his ſon's perſuaſions, whoſe name was Hypomedon, one of the worthieſt men of his age. This Ageſilaus brought over his ſiſter king Agis's mother to the ſentiments of her ſon, notwithſtanding her averſeneſs from them at firſt; and ſhe in a ſhort time brought over moſt of the ladies of Sparta, which was a thing of prodigious conſequence, quence, ſince they had always a mighty ſtroke in political affairs, and their huſbands ſeldom took any ſtep without their advice. On this occaſion, as on many others, they ſhewed their great good ſenſe and virtue; for when they had thoroughly conſidered the matter, and perceived that though theſe new regulations would take away their finery and their trinkets, yet at the ſame time it would reſtore the credit of Sparta and give her new luſtre in the world; they came into it unanimouſly, and endeavoured to engage their husbands to reliſh the propoſal, which they found no difficult taſk to perform among the groſs of the people, who, partly becauſe they ſaw the power of the ſtate decline, and partly from their natural fondneſs for revolutions, were eager to ſee the thing accompliſhed. But the few in whoſe hands the wealth of Sparta was centered grew very uneaſy; they applied themſelves to Leonidas, telling him, that as he was an older and wiſer man than this collegue, he ought to interpoſe, and not ſuffer the conſtitution to be deſtroyed to gratify the ambition of a young man. For theſe poſſeſſors of money called that the conſtitution by which their uſurious gains were to be preſerved, and trembled at the name of Lycurgus, as runaway ſlaves were wont to do if they hear that of their maſter. Leonidas was afraid to meddle with the people, whom he ſaw evidently inclined to favour his collegue and the ſcheme which he had formed. He therefore applied to the principal magiſtrates whom he laboured to bring over to his opinion, that Agis intended to eſtabliſh an independent power in his own perſon by inclining the people to his intereſts; firſt by a remitting of debts, and then by an equal diviſion of lands. The party he formed by theſe ſuggeſtions were very conſiderable; however, Agis perſiſted in his reſolution; and, when his friend Lyſander was choſen one of the ephori, actually preſented his rhetra or decree to the ſenate, the chief articles of which were theſe: That every one ſhould be free from his debts; all the lands to be divided into equal portions; thoſe that lay betwixt the valley of Pellene and mount Taygetus as far as the cities of Mallea and Sellaſia into four thouſand five hundred lots, the remainder into fifteen thouſand; theſe laſt to be ſhared by ſome choſen out of the adjacent countries, men able and fit to bear arms; the firſt among the natural Spartans, admitting alſo ſtrangers to ſupply their number, ſuch as were young, vigorous, well educated, and ingenious. All theſe were to be divided into fifteen companies, ſome of four hundred, dred, ſome of two, with a diet and diſcipline agreeable to the laws of Lycurgus. The matter being hotly debated in the ſenate, Lyſander began to doubt the event, and therefore, without ſtaying to put the queſtion, convoked a general aſſembly of the people; in this aſſembly both the kings, the ephori, and other conſiderable perſons were heard, and by long orations ſought to ſhew the convenience or inconveniency of the ſcheme, according as they were inclined or averſe from it; at laſt, however, it was rejected in the ſenate, though by one voice, and from the time of that rejection the people in general attended on and paid their court to Agis, while the richer citizens, and thoſe eſpecially who had placed their money out at intereſt, applied themſelves to Leonidas. Lyſander, however, contrived a method for removing him out of the way, he cauſed an accuſation to be preferred againſt him for the breach of two old laws, the one forbidding the kings of Sparta to marry a ſtranger, the other prohibiting travel to foreign countries. By the help of theſe accuſations and practiſing a little on the ſuperſtitious temper of the people, he ſo terrified Leonidas, that he fled to the temple of Minerva for ſhelter. Upon this Lyſander ſtirred up Cleombrotus, who was of the royal houſe and who had married the daughter of Leonidas, to pretend to the kingdom, of which when Leonidas had notice, he withdrew, taking his daughter with him, who choſe rather to fly with her father, than to reign with her huſband [q].

[p] Plut. in vit. Agid. & in vit. Cleon.

Cleombrotus ſucceeds Leonidas on his expulſion.

CLEOMBROTUS, being raiſed to the regal dignity, concurred with Agis in all his deſigns; but the next year the ephori being choſen out of the oppoſite faction, they cited Lyſander and his friends to appear before them, and anſwer for what they had done during their adminiſtration; they in this diſtreſs had inſtantly recourſe to the kings beſeeching them to protect thoſe who were threatened for having performed their command; Lyſander at the ſame time ſuggeſted, that the ephori were created only to take care of the ſtate, in caſe any difference happened between the kings; but that while they agreed, theſe magiſtrates had no right to call in queſtion any acts they thought fit to authorize. Agis and Cleombrotus being perſuaded of this, reſolved to make Lyſander and his friends eaſy immediately; they therefore went directly to the [q] Plut. ubi ſupra.

the place where the ephori were ſitting, removed them from their ſeats, and placed others in their room, the firſt of theſe being Ageſilaus. Such a tranſaction as this could not well happen without a tumult, but, through the great care and ſteady integrity of Agis, no blood was ſpilt, nor did any ill accident happen. Ageſilaus indeed had projected the murder of Leonidas as he was on the road to Tegæa; but king Agis having notice of it ſent a conſiderable number of his own friends to eſcort him. Things being in this ſituation, the kings would have proceeded both to the cancelling of debts and to the equal diviſion of lands, had not Ageſilaus prevented it, by pretending that it would not be ſafe to attempt both at one time; but that firſt the debts ſhould be cancelled, and then that monied men would more readily come into a diviſion of lands; this he ſaid, becauſe he had himſelf a good eſtate, but was greatly in debt; wherefore he ſought to rid himſelf of the importunities of his creditors without parting with any of his poſſeſſions. The kings, and even Lyſander, were deceived by his ſpecious pretences, ſo that they came readily into his ſchemes, cauſing all obligations to be brought in and burnt immediately, but referring the diviſion of lands to a further opportunity, which greatly diſpleaſed the people. Agis quickly perceived this, and therefore he ſought to repair his error by immediately dividing the eſtates; but Ageſilaus ſtill found means to put it off under one pretence or other, till Agis was obliged to go with a body of Spartan troops to the aſſiſtance of the Achæans. In his abſence he loſt all bounds of modeſty, and acted ſo tyrannically, that by the time Agis returned a conſpiracy was formed for reſtoring Leonidas, which was accordingly effected; and upon this Agis fled to the temple of Minerva, and Cleombrotus to that of Neptune. Leonidas ſhewed more reſentment againſt his ſon-in-law than againſt Agis, he went to his ſanctuary, and reproached him with his ingratitude and want of duty, and threatened him with death; but his daughter Chelonis, interceding and holding the two children ſhe had in her arms, prevailed ſo far as to have his ſentence changed into that of perpetual baniſhment; in which ſhe accompanied him, notwithſtanding all the entreaties of her father; which extraordinary tranſaction hath drawn this reflection from Plutarch, that Cleombrotus was happier in being baniſhed with ſuch a wife, wife, than he could be in the poſſeſſion of a kingdom without her [r] (T).

Leonidas reſtored to the kingdom, and Cleombrotus baniſhed.

LEONIDAS, once reſettled on the throne, began to contrive all the methods poſſible for drawing Agis out of his ſanctuary, but all his attempts failed; at laſt he corrupted ſome of the king's friends, who were wont to viſit him daily to condole with him, and after a time to carry him to the baths and guard him back again. The names of theſe perſons, for it is but juſt that they ſhould be always recorded, were Amphares, Democharès, and Archeſilaus. The firſt of theſe had borrowed abundance of rich goods and plate from the mother of king Agis; he therefore conceived, if that prince was taken off, he ſhould acquire [r] Plut. ubi ſupra.

(T) The character of Chelonis the wife of Cleombrotus is one of the moſt noble and moſt laudable in the Spartan hiſtory; we cannot therefore be blamed for inſerting her ſpeech to her father, which ſhe pronounced in a mourning habit and in a ſuppliant poſture, thus: "This mourning veſt, theſe dejected looks, and "all thoſe other tokens of unutterable woe, which cannot be "concealed, are not worn for the ſake of Cleombrotus, but "were put on to condole with you in your baniſhment; "and now you are reſtored to your country and to your king-"dom, muſt I ſtill remain in grief and miſery? Or would you "have me attired in my feſtival ornaments, that I may rejoice "with you, when you have killed within my arms the man "to whom you gave me for a wife? Either Cleombrotus muſt "appeaſe you by mine and my children's tears, or he muſt "ſuffer a puniſhment greater than his faults have deſerved: "he ſhall infallibly ſee me die before him, whom he ſo ten-"derly loves. To what end ſhould I live, or how ſhall I ap-"pear among the Spartan ladies, when it ſhall ſo manifeſtly be "ſeen that I have not been able to move compaſſion, either "in my huſband for the ſake of my father, or in my father "for the ſake of my huſband? I was born, it ſeems, to be diſ-"honoured and diſgraced both as a wife and a daughter, in "that relation which is neareſt to me in each capacity. As for "Cleombrotus, I ſufficiently diſowned his cauſe, when I forſook "him to follow you; but now you yourſelf will juſtify his "proceedings, by ſhewing to the world that for the ſake of "a kingdom it is juſt to kill a ſon-in-law, and be regardleſs of a "daughter" (70).

(70) Plut. in vit. Agid.

acquire the poſſeſſion of them; the other two were bribed by Leonidas; theſe men therefore took an opportunity when king Agis was returning from the baths and relied entirely on their protection, to ſeize him; Amphares catched him by the arm, Demochares, being a ſtrong man, threw a cloak over his head and muffled him up; then their aſſociates coming in to their aſſiſtance, they dragged their ſovereign away to the common priſon, where the new ephori, conſtituted by Leonidas, ſat ready to judge him. To give the greater colour of juſtice to their proceedings, ſome ſenators were by, but they took care that they ſhould be ſuch as were of their party. As ſoon as the king came in, they aſked him how he durſt attempt to alter the government; at which he ſmiled without affording them an anſwer, which provoked one of the ephori to tell him, That he ought rather to weep, for they would now make him ſenſible of his preſumption. Another aſked him, Whether he was not conſtrained to do what he did by Ageſilaus and Lyſander; to which the king with a compoſed countenance anſwered, I was conſtrained by no man, the deſign was mine, and my intent was to have reſtored the laws of Lycurgus and to have governed by them. But do you not now, ſaid one of his judges, repent of your raſhneſs? No, replied the king, though I ſee my death is inevitable, I can never repent of ſo juſt and honourable an intention. The ephori then ordered him to be haled away and ſtrangled. The officers of juſtice refuſed to obey, and even the mercenary ſoldiers declined ſo unworthy an action; whereupon Demochares, reviling them for cowards, forced the king into the room where the execution was to be performed. Agis about to die, perceiving one of the ſerjeants bitterly bewailing his misfortune, ſaid, Weep not, friend, for me, who die innocently; but grieve for thoſe who are guilty of this wicked act; my condition is much better than theirs. Then ſtretching out his neck, he ſubmitted to death with a conſtancy worthy both of the royal dignity and his own great character. Immediately after Agis was dead, Amphares went out of the priſon gate, where he found Ageſiſtrata, who caſting herſelf at his feet, he gently raiſed her up, pretending ſtill the ſame friendſhip as formerly. He aſſured her ſhe need not fear any further violence ſhould be offered againſt her ſon; and that, if ſhe pleaſed, ſhe might go in and ſee him; ſhe begged her mother might alſo have the favour

favour of being admitted, and he replied no body ſhould hinder it. When they were entered, he commanded the gate ſhould again be locked, and the grandmother to be firſt introduced; ſhe was now grown very old, and had lived all her days with great reputation of wiſdom and virtue. As ſoon as Amphares thought ſhe was diſpatched, he told Ageſiſtrata ſhe might now go in if ſhe pleaſed; ſhe entered, where beholding her ſon's body ſtretched on the ground and her mother hanging by the neck, ſhe ſtood at firſt aſtoniſhed at ſo horrid a ſpectacle; but after a while recollecting her ſpirits, the firſt thing ſhe did was to aſſiſt the ſoldiers in taking down the body; then covering it decently, ſhe laid it by her ſon's, where embracing and kiſſing his cheeks, O my ſon, ſaid ſhe, it is thy too great mercy and goodneſs which has brought thee and us to this untimely end. Amphares, who ſtood watching behind the door, hearing this, ruſhed in haſtily; and, with a furious tone and countenance, ſaid to her, ſince you approve ſo well of your ſon's actions, it is fit you ſhould partake in his reward. She, riſing up to meet her deſtiny, only uttered theſe few words; I pray the gods that all this may redound to the good of Sparta[r]. Archidamus the brother of Agis ſaved himſelf by flight, but was conſtrained to leave his wife, who had juſt lain in, behind him; her becauſe ſhe was the heireſs of a great eſtate, Leonidas compelled by force to marry his own ſon Cleomenes; from this the young lady was very averſe, yet in the end ſhe was forced to comply. Cleomenes behaved towards her with ſo much tenderneſs and humanity, that ſhe became quickly reconciled to her marriage, but continued to hate her father-in-law for all that. Cleomenes was too young to conſummate the marriage as yet, but having an extreme tenderneſs for his wife, he would often beg her to relate to him the ſtory of Agis's murder, at which he wept, and by degrees began privately to follow his example; yet he followed it according to his own diſpoſition, which was by far more bold and violent than that of Agis. He was conſtrained, however, to bridle his deſires till after the death of his father, he well knowing, that both the king and the nobles were too much diſſolved in luxury and eaſe ever to incline to, or ſo much as bear with, the execution of his deſign.

On

[r] Plut. in vit. Agid.

On the death of Leonidas, Cleomenes mounted the Spartan throne alone, and in the very beginning of his reign found himself obliged to exert both his conduct and his courage. Aratus at the head of the Achæans had formed a grand project of uniting all the Peloponnesians into that league; the youth of Cleomenes seemed to furnish him with an opportunity of trying the disposition of the Spartans, which he neglected not, but suddenly invaded the Arcadians their neighbours and their friends, who lived in a manner under their protection[s]. The ephori upon this ordered Cleomenes to seize on a pass into Laconia, which was then in the hands of the allies of the Achæans, which he performed, and afterwards disappointed Aratus in a scheme he had formed for seizing Tegæa and Orchomenium. Upon which the young king sent a message full of sneer to Aratus; the old statesman deriding his youth asked Democrites, a Spartan exile who lived with him, What sort of a person this Cleomenes was? Why, my friend, replied the Spartan, I will answer you in few words; if you have any thing to do against the Lacedæmonians, let me advise you to begin before this young eagle's talons are grown. In the subsequent course of the war, Aratus by his great skill obtained some advantages over the Spartans; but Cleomenes gave therein such shining instances of his courage and military virtues, that this great captain grew himself apprehensive, and the people of Sparta seemed to take new spirit, from their king. The ephori, however, were for putting an end to the war, because they did not care to run any hazard, and because they were not a little afraid of success, which they knew would raise not only the power, but the credit of Cleomenes, which they dreaded more than that of their enemies. The king, who was a man of great penetration, saw clearly, that without reducing the power of the ephori, he should have nothing more left him than the title of the king, with this farther mortification, that he should see the power of Sparta sink daily, without being able to hinder it. In this perplexity he took a bold resolution of ridding himself of the ephori at once; this he communicated to some of his friends, who agreed to assist him in it from the same generous desire of restoring the glory of their country[t]. The first step that was taken in this business was the recalling of Archidamus the brother of Agis, who on his approach to Sparta was murdered by Cleomenes succeeds Leonidas. Year after the Flood, 2763. Before Christ 236.

[s] Plut. in vit. Arati. [t] Plut. in vit. Cleom.

by his brother's enemies, not without ſome ſuſpicion that Cleomenes conſented thereto; but this ſeems to agree little with his character, and Plutarch, who reports this ſuggeſtion, owns, if there was any truth in it, he was forced thereto [u]. When it appeared a point out of diſpute, that without an army a revolution could not be effected, he by money prevailed on the ephori to engage in a war and to give him the command. His mother Crateſiclea, a woman of great ſpirit, perceiving the difficulties her ſon had to ſtruggle with, married again, that ſhe might fix a nobleman of great intereſt to his party, and at the ſame time engaged to give up her own fortune, perſuading her huſband alſo to come to the ſame terms, whenever a diviſion of goods and of lands ſhould be made. Cleomenes, carrying ſuch as he ſuſpected moſt into the field with him, did many things there worthy of a Spartan prince; but withal he took care ſo to harraſs his army with quick and almoſt continual marches, that many deſired to be left behind in Arcadia; with the reſt he advanced ſlowly towards Lacedæmon. When he drew near the place, he ſent a ſmall party headed by ſome of his confidents, who ſurprized the ephori at ſupper, killed four of them upon the ſpot, and had killed the fifth if he had not counterfeited himſelf dead, and thereby gained an opportunity of retiring, wounded as he was, to a temple, from whence he came forth next day without being injured. On the morrow Cleomenes came into the forum, ordered all the chairs of the ephori to be removed, except one which he reſerved for himſelf: then he made a moſt artful apology to the people for what he had done (U); he ſhewed them the neceſſity of reſtoring the [u] Id. ibid. Polyb. l. v.

(U) It is from Plutarch that we learn the purport of the king's ſpeech on this occaſion, which it is neceſſary for us to report here, not only as it nearly concerns the preſent thread of our hiſtory, but becauſe we have referred ourſelves to it elſewhere, as containing ſeveral curious particulars relating to the Spartan policy. Cleomenes then in this harangue alledged, "That the government, as it "was framed by Lycurgus, was compoſed of the kings and the "ſenate; and that that model of government had continued a "long time, and needed no other ſort of magiſtrates to give it "perfection. But afterwards in the long war with the Meſſeni"ans, when the kings being to command the armies had no time "to attend civil cauſes, they choſe ſome of their friends, and left "them the Lycurgic inſtitutions, and aſſured them, that though the ſituation of things had obliged him to make uſe of violence in effecting this reſolution, yet for the future he would

" them to determine the ſuits of their citizens in their ſtead. " Theſe were called ephori, and at firſt behaved themſelves " as ſervants to the kings, but afterwards by degrees they " appropriated the power to themſelves, and erected a diſtinct " ſort of magiſtracy. An evidence of the truth of this may be " taken from the uſual behaviour of the kings, who upon the firſt " and ſecond meſſage of the ephori refuſed to go, but upon the " third readily attended them: And Aſteropus, the firſt that " raiſed the ephori to that height of power, was not Ephorus till " many years after their inſtitution; therefore, whilſt they mo- " deſtly contained themſelves within their own proper ſphere, it " was better to bear with them than to make a diſturbance. But " that an upſtart introduced power ſhould ſo far deſtroy the old " model of government, as to baniſh ſome kings, murder others, " without hearing their defence, and threaten thoſe who de- " ſired to ſee the beſt and moſt divine conſtitution reſtored in " Sparta, was unſufferable. Therefore if it had been poſſible for " him without blood-ſhed to have freed Lacedæmon from thoſe " foreign plagues, luxury, vanity, debts, and uſury; and from " thoſe more antient evils, poverty and riches, he ſhould have " thought himſelf the happieſt king in the world; having, like " an expert phyſician, cured the diſeaſes of his country without " pain. But now in this neceſſity, Lycurgus's example favoured " his proceedings; who being neither king nor magiſtrate, but a " private man, and aiming at the kingdom, came armed into the " market-place, inſomuch, that king Charilaus fled for fear to " the altar: But he, being a good man and a lover of his country, " readily conſented to Lycurgus's project, and admitted an altera- " tion in the ſtate. Thus by his own actions Lycurgus ſhewed, " that it was difficult to correct the government without force " and fear; in uſing which, he ſaid he would be ſo moderate as " never to deſire their aſſiſtance; but either to terrify or ruin " the enemies of Sparta's happineſs and ſafety. He commanded " that all the land ſhould be left in common, and private claims " laid aſide: That debtors ſhould be diſcharged of their debts, " and a ſtrict ſearch be made who were foreigners, and who not. " That the true Spartans recovering their courage might defend " the city with their arms; and that they might no longer ſee " Laconia, for want of a ſufficient number to ſecure it, waited by " the Ætolians (70)".

(70) Plutarch. in vit. Cleom.

would pay a ſtrict regard to the laws, though for his own ſafety he proſcribed at this time fourſcore citizens. He was the firſt who delivered up his whole ſubſtance to the public ſtock, wherein he was followed by his father-in-law and other friends. In aſſigning the lands, he gave ſhares to all whom he had baniſhed, promiſing to recal them as ſoon as was conſiſtent with the public ſafety; immediately after he reſtored the old Laconic way of educating youth, of eating in public, and of doing their exerciſes together; he alſo raiſed a conſiderable body of troops, and diſciplined and armed them in a new manner; to ſhew his diſlike to tyranny, and to remove any umbrage that his citizens might take at his doing all theſe things by his own authority, he aſſociated his brother Euclidas in the kingdom, declaring, that for the future there ſhould be always two kings at Sparta as there were in times paſt, and that he would not erect a monarchy in order to tranſmit it to his poſterity; which declaration of his was extremely grateful to the people. But that which of all others ſerved to eſtabliſh moſt the power and the character of Cleomenes, was the courſe of his own life, which was in nothing more ſtately or more expenſive than that of the meaneſt citizen. There were in his houſe no purple furnitures, no canopies or cloths of ſtate, no ſuperb chairs or couches for indulging eaſe, but a plain king, and every thing plain about him: when any offered petitions, he ſtepped forward to receive them, talking graciouſly to every body, redreſſed all the injuries that were done by others, and did none himſelf; yet had his virtue nothing in it of auſterity or affectation; he was naturally of a pleaſant temper, which he indulged. When ſtrangers dined with him he had plenty of wine, which was ſet down in a braſs veſſel, with ſilver cups near it, according to the number of the gueſts, every man being permitted to drink what he pleaſed, being neither deſired nor forced to drink more. Being informed that Aratus and the Achæans intended to give him ſome diſturbance, from an apprehenſion that after theſe alterations he durſt not leave the city, he immediately marched with a body of troops into their territories, and cut them out work enough at home. In the courſe of the war, he gained ſuch advantages over Aratus, as made that great ſtateſman and captain decline being choſen captain general of the Achæans next year as he was wont; yet did not Cleomenes make any ill uſe of his victories, or attempt to oppreſs the cities which fell into his power, but reſtored them to their liberty, and, where they had been expelled, recalled recalled their antient inhabitants. The Achæans were so much frighted with this unexpected run of ill success, that they were ready to listen to any terms which Cleomenes should think fit to offer. That generous victor declared, that he sought nothing more than to be acknowledged general of the Greeks, and that he was ready to deliver up the prisoners without ransom, and to restore the cities he had taken. Lerna was appointed for the place of treaty, the Aehæans being willing to accept of the king's terms; but Cleomenes marching thither swiftly heated himself very much by the way, and drinking in the midst of his heat a draught of cold water, threw himself into a fever, which was attended with the loss of his speech; he ordered, however, the principal captives of the Achæans to be set at liberty, and put off the meeting to another time and place. This accident ruined him and Greece; for Aratus, who till this time had approved himself a most worthy Grecian commander, now suffered envy, jealousy, and self-conceit to triumph over his virtue and love for his country; and he, who in his youth had expelled the Macedonians out of Peloponnesus merely from the love of freedom, now privately recalled them, fearing that Cleomenes, the most worthy of the Spartan kings, should be raised to that dignity which he so highly deserved [x]. When Cleomenes was recovered, he advanced towards Argos, where the Achæans held their assembly; but when he drew near, Aratus caused deputies to be sent him, to inform him, that he must either enter the city alone, or be content to treat without the place; to which Cleomenes answered, That he was unjustly dealt with, for they ought to have told him so plainly at first, and not now when he was come to their very doors, shew their jealousy and deny him admission. Not long after he declared war, and began to act offensively. Upon this the whole league of the Achæans was put into a ferment, most of the towns being ready to revolt and break the union; because on the one side the people had been made to hope for a division of the lands and a discharge of their debts; and on the other the nobility grew weary of Aratus's power, and were almost all of them provoked against him for having called the Macedonians into Peloponnesus. Encouraged by these misunderstandings, Cleomenes invaded Achæa, where he first took Pellene by surprize and beat out the Achæan garrison; afterwards he made himſelf maſter of Phenæon and Penteleon. Not long after he ſurprized Argos, and in a very ſmall ſpace of time raiſed himſelf to greater power than any of his predeceſſors, and his city to greater pre-eminence than ſhe had ever held in Greece. In this ſpace he would very gladly have treated with Aratus, offering him any terms to have engaged his friendſhip; but he was immoveable in his reſolution of deſtroying the Spartan greatneſs. With this view he procured the caſtle of Corinth, which was the key of Peloponneſus, to be delivered up to Antigonus, who ſuddenly came to his aſſiſtance with an army of twenty-eight thouſand foot and twelve hundred horſe. Cleomenes, though he was much inferior to the enemy, yet defended the far greater part of Peloponneſus till Argos was betrayed; even there he did great things, and when over-powered by numbers he could do no more, made a moſt glorious retreat. At this time he received from Sparta the news of his wife's death, at which he was exceedingly grieved; for though the Spartans were remarkable for being fond huſbands, yet Cleomenes was diſtinguiſhed for his fondneſs even among them. He bore his grief, however, like a hero and like a king; he went to his houſe, indulged his ſorrow with his mother and other relations, and then returning to the camp reſumed his functions of a monarch and a general, without ſuffering his private concerns to interfere with public affairs. Ptolemy at this time offered him his friendſhip in caſe he would ſend him his mother and his ſon as hoſtages. This demand troubled Cleomenes; he went often to break the matter to his parent, but was unable to do it; at laſt, when it broke out, Crateſiclea burſt out a laughing; Well, ſaid ſhe, was it this you were afraid of telling? Why do you not put me on ſhipboard, and ſend this carcaſs where it may be ſerviceable to Sparta, before age waſtes it unprofitably here? When ſhe was going on board, ſhe withdrew her ſon into the temple of Neptune, where having wept and embraced each other, Come king of Sparta, ſaid ſhe, let us dry our tears, that no ſigns of grief may appear when we go out, nor any token of weakneſs appear unworthy your dignity or the honour of our country, ſince our actions are all that are in our power, and events belong wholly to providence. She wrote afterwards to him from Egypt: King of Sparta, do what is worthy of your country and may redound to its profit; nor, for the ſake of an old woman and a little child, ſtand in fear of what Ptolemy may do. Cleomenes acted in this unequal war with all the conduct duct and valour that could be expected in the moſt excellent captain among the Greeks [y]. He had to do with a numerous army compoſed of veterans, well armed, and well diſciplined, and well paid; his own troops were moſt of them new-raiſed, many of them half armed, and nothing, but what he could get, to ſubſiſt them with. Yet he kept the war out of Laconia, took the city of Megalopolis, which was bigger than Sparta, in the midſt of king Antigonus's armies; and when he had taken it, generouſly offered to reſtore it untouched to its citizens; but they, rejecting his offer, abandoned it to the plunder of his ſoldiers [z]. After this he harraſſed the territory of Argos, and raiſed mighty contributions, though Antigonus and the Macedonian forces were in that very city. This even in his own time was ſtiled raſhneſs, arrogance, and a vain-glorious ſhew of ſhort-lived ſucceſs; and it is owing to Polybius, that poſterity conſiders it in a different light; for he tells us, that though the generality believed Cleomenes to have acted from a deſperate temerity, yet men of the beſt diſcernment and underſtanding agreed, that he behaved with great prudence and judgment. The true ſtate of the caſe is this: Cleomenes ſaw, that though at preſent he could make head againſt his enemies, yet in a ſhort time he ſhould be deſtroyed without fighting; he therefore ſought to provoke Antigonus to fight, where his choice of ground might give him an advantage; and here again Antigonus gave a ſtrong teſtimony of his conſummate ſkill in military affairs; for notwithſtanding the murmurs of his own troops, the outcries of the Greeks, and the inſults of Cleomenes, he kept himſelf where he was, and would not ſuffer either his own, or the paſſions of others, to puſh him upon a ſtep which might be injurious to his fortune. But afterwards, when he had it in his power to fight, and Cleomenes by reaſon of his poverty could no longer decline it, he gave him battle at Selaſia, where, partly through the ſuperiority of the Macedonian troops, partly through the treachery of Damoteles, the Lacedæmonians were defeated with a vaſt ſlaughter of their mercenary troops, and with almoſt the utter deſtruction of their own; for of ſix thouſand Spartans only two hundred eſcaped. In the beginning of the action Cleomenes had the better, at leaſt in that part of the army where he commanded in perſon; but looking behind him, and seeing the other wing commanded by his brother surrounded, he cried out, Thou art lost, dear brother, thou art lost, thou brave example to our Spartan youth, and theme of our matrons songs! This misfortune of Cleomenes deserves the more to be pitied, since, if he could have avoided fighting but two days, he must have seen Antigonus constrained to abandon the Achæans; for within that space after the battle messengers arrived in his camp from Macedonia, which brought advice of such disorders there as forced him immediately to return [a]. When the battle was over, Cleomenes retired to Sparta, where, however, he knew it was impossible for him to stay, nor indeed did he rest there above a few hours; for, after having given a few directions, he went to his own house, where, without taking any refreshment, he leaned himself, in his armour as he was, against a pillar, and considering what he should do, he at length determined to retire to Egypt; which resolution he and his friends immediately put into execution, going directly to Gythium, there imbarqued on board a few ships, and passed over to Ptolemy Euergetes, who entertained him honourably while he lived; but his son growing suspicious of him confined him, which Cleomenes at length resenting, he with twelve friends forced the place where he was confined; but finding it afterwards impracticable to escape, they slew each other. Ptolemy Philopator in revenge of this caused the body of Cleomenes to be exposed on a cross, butchered his mother, the rest of his family, and all her attendants. Miserable end of so great a man, who fought only to make his country free, and his countrymen virtuous! In him ended the Herculean race of Spartan kings, if we except the short reign of Agesipolis which we shall presently mention (X).

[x] Plut. in vit. Arat. Polyb. lib. ii.

[y] Plut. ubi ſupra, & in vit. Arati. Polyb. ubi ſupra. [z] Plut. in vit. Arat. & Philopœm.

After

[a] Polyb. lib. ii. Plut. in vit. Cleomen. & Philop. Justin. lib. xxviii. c. 4.

(X) In this note we shall vindicate our history of the reign of Cleomenes, which we confess to be very little consistent with the account given us by Polybius, though we acknowledge that he is, generally speaking, a a most judicious and impartial writer, and had great opportunities of knowing the true state of things at the time of which we are speaking; and yet we affirm, that he has not spoken of Cleomenes things exactly conformable to truth, whence we conceive we had a just right to differ from him, notwithstanding his great and established reputation. Two things therefore

AFTER the fatal battle of Selasia, Sparta fell into the hands of king Antigonus, who, out of regard to the merit of

The state of Sparta after the flight of Cleomenes.

therefore we shall endeavour to demonstrate in this note: First, That Polybius hath injured the character of Cleomenes in his history; and, Secondly, That the causes of his misrepresentations may with probability, and even with certainty, be assigned. First then, Polybius, opening to his reader the causes of the Cleomenic war, writes thus: When this war was kindled, and Cleomenes had ruined the republic of Lacedæmon, and converted a lawful authority into tyrannic power, Aratus, who saw that this prince made war with no less conduct than valour, and being at the same time afraid of what might be attempted by the Ætolians, thought it necessary to counterwork their projects (71). In this passage Cleomenes is roundly declared a tyrant, aud undoubtedly he was so in the opinion of all the Achæans; and the historians of those times dealt so freely with his character, that the great Livy makes no scruple of calling him Cleomenes the first tyrant of Lacedæmon (72). Pausanias is yet more outrageous; he says, that Cleomenes, following the example of the great Pausanias who gained the battle of Platæa, affected tyranny, and thereby disgusted the Lacedæmonians so much, that they hated the thought of kings ever after (73). Yet all these great men are most certainly in the wrong; nay, Polybius and Pausanias are so of their own shewing. For the first every where admits, that Cleomenes was a prince of great wisdom and mildness, as well as intrepidly valiant and of a lofty spirit The reason for which he stiles him a tyrant is, as appears from the foregoing passage, because he altered that condition of the republic in which it stood when he ascended the throne. It is confessed he did so, but that this could not denominate him a tyrant, we will prove from Polybius himself. In another part of his writings, descanting like a grave politician, as indeed he was, on the ruin of the Spartan state, he makes use of these words: "Lycurgus, in providing by his laws for the harmony of his ci-" tizens, for the security of his polity, and the maintenance of " liberty, hath done so well, that his institutes seem rather to be " divine than human. An equality of possessions with a simple " and inexpensive course of life could not but render men honest " and sociable in private life, and quiet and peaceable in public " concerns; finally, continual exercise and a readiness to under-" take any kind of labour could not fail of making them both " valiant and indefatigable (74)". He then shews, that their affecting conquest engaged them to depart from the laws of Lycurgus, and induced their ruin; and in the very place where he calls Cleomenes (71) Polyb. Hist. lib. iv. (72) Liv. lib. xxxiv. (73) Pausan. in Corinthiacis. (74) Fragment. lib. xiii.

of their anceſtors, treated the inhabitants with great kindneſs and indulgence; they in return for this behaved for a time

Cleomenes tyrant, he commiſerates the Lacedæmonians, for having from a ſtate of perfect freedom ſunk by degrees into that of abject ſlavery under Nabis, by a continual declenſion from the Lycurgic inſtitutes. Now, if the ſlavery of the Lacedæmonians and their ruin aroſe from their leaving the laws of Lycurgus, and if the laws of Lycurgus derived their chief excellence from their enjoining an equality of poſſeſſions, a ſimple frugal life, and continual exerciſe, how could Cleomenes be a tyrant for changing that declining condition, in which he found the Spartan republic, into that form, as near as might be, wherein Lycurgus left it? but perhaps it will be ſaid he acted tyrannically in putting to death the ephori, and in effecting this alteration by force; yet if this be admitted, it will ſubvert all the Greek notions of liberty. The ephori were not eſtabliſhed by Lycurgus, they had exceeded the limits of their office, they had deſtroyed the conſtitution by introducing the ſale of lands, they had moſt impiouſly murdered Agis their natural ſovereign, and, in one word, by keeping one of the thrones of Sparta vacant, which they did by force, they violated the fundamental laws of the ſtate, and had, as Polybius phraſes it, changed a legal authority into a moſt deteſtable tyranny, from which Cleomenes reſcued his country, and reſtored it to its antient luſtre and liberty by the only way it could be effected, that is by force. That Cleomenes was legally king of Sparta, Polybius himſelf owns; that the change he wrought did not make him a tyrant, we have proved, and conſequently we have ſhewn, that Livy was in an error when he ſtiled him the firſt of the Lacedæmonian tyrants. We will next ſhew the falſhood of Pauſanias's account, he ſays, that Cleomenes affected the empire of Greece, and Polybius intimates the ſame thing, but they offer no facts to ſupport it; and the contrary thereof is evident from the current of Polybius's hiſtory. A tyrant is one who ſacrifices public rights to his particular views, which Cleomenes, had mighty opportunities of doing, and whenever he had them, conſtantly rejected them. He brought his paternal eſtate into the public ſtock when he new-modelled Sparta; he reſtored all the cities he took to their antient form of government, when he might have annexed them to his own dominions; and choſe to have allies where he might have had ſubjects; with reaſon therefore have we concluded with Plutarch, that he did not affect the tyranny of Greece. As to the latter part of Pauſanias's cenſure, that the Spartans ſo hated the memory of Cleomenes, it is diametrically oppoſite to truth; for Polybius tells us, that after his flight into Egypt they remained without kings, becauſe they tenderly loved Cleomenes, and ardently wiſhed and expected his return.

time very quietly, and, ſubmitting to the preſent ſituation of things, acted in ſuch a manner as might give leaſt umbrage to Aratus and the Achæans, who were the king's friends; as long as Cleomenes lived, though an exile and at laſt a priſoner in Egypt, the Spartans lived as well as they could under the government of the ephori and ſenate; but as ſoon as the news came of his death, and they were once thoroughly aſcertained it was true, new ſtirs aroſe, in which Adimas, one of the ephori, endeavoured all he could to moderate the people; and when his collegues had ſummoned them to meet in arms, he had the courage to repreſent to them, how little their behaviour correſponded with their circumſtances, turn. Theſe are his very words, and he afterwards tells us, that as ſoon as they knew that Cleomenes was dead, they reſolved to be no longer without kings. We come now to the ſecond part of what we propoſed, the cauſes of Polybius's miſrepreſentations, and they were no other than thoſe which have been and will be common in the world, as long as it is inhabited by men. Polybius lived in theſe times: He was by birth of the city of Megalopolis which Cleomenes deſtroyed; he was an Achæan ſtatesman, a profeſſed and zealous friend of Aratus, the capital enemy of this prince whom he ſo much decries. Aratus ſought to bring all the Peloponneſian ſtates into the Achæan league, and why? that they might be thereby ſafe againſt the Macedonian power; Cleomenes oppoſed this, becauſe it was contrary to the intereſt of Sparta, which would have thereby become inconſiderable. Aratus endeavoured in a time of full peace to have executed his ſcheme by force, on a ſuppoſition, that Cleomenes being a young man might have been eaſily depoſed. After all, when Cleomenes in his own defence had humbled the Achæans, he did not pretend to reduce them into ſubjection, but offered to join with them to ſupport the liberty of Greece againſt the Macedonian kings; but Aratus, reſolving to have all things his own way, called in theſe very Macedonians, delivered up to them Acro-Corinth, deſtroyed the Lacedæmonian kingdom, induced the ruin of his own country, and was himſelf poiſoned by Philip king of Macedon, whom he vainly called and imagined to be his pupil. Polybius, miſled by Aratus's notions, paints Cleomenes as a tyrant, though he took the only method to preſerve Greece free, and Greece loſt her freedom becauſe he failed in his deſign; this has appeared ſince, and Plutarch, who was a true friend to liberty and virtue, living without the reach of prejudice, has done that juſtice to Cleomenes which Polybius denied him (75).

(75) Hiſt. lib. iv. Plut. in vit. Cleom. Arati & Philopœmen.

circumstances, and how unreasonable it was for them to involve themselves in their present unsettled condition in a new war with the Macedonians, who not long ago had vanquished them, and had ever treated them well. The people of Sparta, like the people of most other cities, were inclined to listen to reason as soon as they began to understand it, which the rest of the ephori perceiving, they and their associates gathered about Adimas and stabbed him; which once done, they did what they pleased. Soon after this Philip the son of Antigonus arrived with a great army on their frontiers, when the Spartans sent deputies to make their submission, which when the king had heard, he suffered them to withdraw, and caused the matter to be afterwards debated in council. Most of those who composed it, after representing the Lacedæmonians as a turbulent and factious people, declared, that the king ought to treat them as heretofore Alexander had done the Thebans, that is, put their principal men to death, and humble the rest by a very severe chastisement. But the king, though but seventeen years old, differed from them; he said, the sedition of the Spartans turned to their own hurt; that on his appearance they had offered to submit themselves and become his subjects; and that to put their principal men to death and mal-treat the rest would be unworthy of a prince; he therefore contented himself with telling the deputies, that he should have his eye upon the Spartans for the future, and therefore advised them to be quiet; after which he dismissed them [b].

Lycurgus and Agesipolis elected kings.

The Ætolians, making new disturbances in Greece, were very desirous to engage the Lacedæmonians in their interest; to this end they sent Machates embassador to Sparta; he endeavoured to persuade the ephori to chuse two kings, and to unite themselves strictly with the Ætolians; but those magistrates, liking neither of his propositions, procured them both to be rejected by the people, notwithstanding that a strong party had declared themselves for Machates. This party after his departure found means to stir up the people so effectually against the ephori, that at a solemn festival they murdered them at the temple of Pallas, and elected others, whom they directed to elect kings. In consequence of this, they chose first Agesipolis a boy, the grandson of Cleombrotus whom Leonidas banished, and appointed Cleomenes, the son of Cleombrotus and the child's uncle

[b] Polyb. lib. iv. Plut. in vit. Arat.

uncle, his tutor. For the other king they ſet up Lycurgus, a man no way allied to the royal family, or at leaſt never conceived to be allied to it, till by giving a talent a-piece to the ephori, they declared him of the Herculean race and the lawful king of Sparta. He after ſome time drove Ageſipolis into baniſhment, and involved his country in ſeveral wars, which he waged with various ſucceſs. At laſt Chilo conſpired againſt him; this man conceived he had ſome right to the Spartan throne, and having engaged about two hundred perſons to abet his ſcheme, he fell upon the ephori ſuddenly and murdered them; after which he ſurrounded the houſe of Lycurgus, who by the fidelity of ſome of his ſervants, made his eſcape. Chilo, perceiving that the people little affected him, fled out of Laconia, and retired to the Macedonians whom he endeavoured to irritate againſt his country. When things were a little ſettled, Lycurgus was recalled, and reigned in Sparta many years. When king Philip came into Peloponneſus for the ſecond time, and began to tranſact things there, not only without the advice, but contrary to the opinion, of Aratus, Lycurgus and the Lacedæmonians began to take heart, and to think once more of contending with the power of Macedon, notwithſtanding all the miſchiefs they had ſuſtained; neither were they frighted from this purpoſe, when they were informed, that the king was become friends again with Aratus and his ſon; wherefore, as ſoon as the ſeaſon of the year permitted, they invaded Meſſenia, which immediately drew Philip that way, upon which Lycurgus retired, that he might put his country into a condition to ſuſtain the invaſion, which he plainly perceived was intended, though king Philip took all the precautions poſſible to hinder his deſign from being penetrated [c]. He advanced with his army as far as Amyclæ, from whence he ſpoiled all the country round about: In the mean time the Meſſenians invaded Laconia on the other ſide, reſolving to march through it and join the Macedonians; but while their commander, who greatly contemned the Spartans in their preſent diſtreſſed condition, encamped careleſly and without throwing up any intrenchments, Lycurgus ſuddenly attacked them with ſuch ſucceſs, that he took the greateſt part of their horſes and baggage, and returned with much honour to Sparta. As ſoon as he returned, he made the neceſſary diſpoſitions for the defence of the city. In the firſt place, he recovered the poſts which the Macedonians had had seized on the mountains, and then causing the waters of the Eurotas to be dammed up, he provided a means of laying all the country between the river and the mountains under water; so that the Macedonians, not being able to march that way, would be obliged to coast the foot of the mountains, and thereby expose their rear to the insults of Lycurgus and his Lacedæmonians. Philip perceiving this resolved, first of all to dispossess Lycurgus of his posts in the mountains, which, at the head of a choice body of troops, he with much ado performed; however, he retired with his forces at last into the city, which he preserved from any insults; and thus this great king of Macedon, after having plundered and ravaged Laconia, was obliged to retire, his own camp being full of sedition, and his soldiers more inclined to mutiny than fighting. Some short time after this, the ephori, having, or pretending to have, information, that Lycurgus intended to make himself absolute, they attempted to surprize and murder him in his house; but he, having previous notice of their design, withdrew into Ætolia, and the iniquity of the ephori being clearly discovered by the people, he was shortly after recalled. What he did after this we know not, nor how long he held the kingdom; whether he died in peace, or by the sword; in possession of the regal authority, or not; neither can we say what steps were taken by the Spartans when they lost this king of their own election: If we take him for the last of their princes, or if, according to others, we look upon Cleomenes in that light, either way we shall see the oracle concerning a lame reign fulfilled; but perhaps it will be better to interpret this prophecy generally of all single reigns, which, according to the constitution of Sparta, could not but be lame, and under them all the people were most notoriously unhappy, falling continually from bad to worse, every succeeding tyrant excelling in wickedness his predecessor.

[c] Polyb. Hiſt. lib. iv. Plut. in vit. Arat.

Machanidas assumes the tyranny. Year after the flood, 2792. Before Christ 207.

MACHANIDAS was the successor of Lycurgus, but when he attained the sovereignty is very uncertain; the year in which we find him first mentioned, we have placed in the margin; by what colour he held his dignity appears not, but that he was a person of great abilities is certain. At home he ejected the ephori, as not caring to have any either equal or greater than himself in Sparta; abroad he made all Peloponnesus tremble, which in all probability he would have subdued and brought under his own power, if Philopœmen pœmen the chief of the Achæans had not oppoſed him [d]. He engaged all the cities in that league to furniſh troops for reducing the power of Machanidas within bounds, which, as he plainly ſhewed, if not timely undertaken, would be a thing beyond their abilities. When he had drawn together this army, after exerciſing them for ſome time in ſlight ſkirmiſhes, he marched towards Mantinæa, in order of battle. Thither alſo came Machanidas at the head of a very powerful army, compoſed not only of Spartans, but of mercenaries; an engagement quickly followed, which was very obſtinate, in which at firſt Machanidas had the better; but he purſuing this advantage too far, Philopœmen attacked him in the rear; however, the Lacedæmonians fought deſperately for a time, expecting that Machanidas would come to their relief, which accordingly he did; but Philopœmen foreſeeing that he would take the ſhorteſt way, and knowing that there was a ditch there of which Machanidas was ignorant, he left Polybius the Megalopolitan to puſh the enemy that were ſtill fighting, and with a ſmall party of horſe advanced to the ditch to meet Machanidas, whom he preſently diſtinguiſhed by his purple robe. The tyrant, who with two or three friends had outrode the reſt of his troops, ſeeing that Philopœmen and his company were but few, reſolved to paſs the ditch; in order to this he puſhed his horſe directly againſt Philopœmen, who turning ſide-ways from him, as if he meant to avoid him, brought the point of his ſpear to bear directly againſt his breaſt as his horſe leaped, ſo that, juſt as he paſſed the ditch, Machanidas fell down dead; this put an end to the battle, for as ſoon as his death was known his army fled: The Achæans waſted all the provinces which had been ſubject to him, the Spartans, who loſt four thouſand men in this engagement, having neither ſpirits nor ſtrength to oppoſe them [e].

Not long after the death of Machanidas, we find Sparta under a new and yet ſeverer bondage under one Nabis, who is reported to have exceeded all tyrants, and to have left the epithets of gracious and merciful to Phalaris and Dionyſius on a compariſon of their actions with his. Other evil princes had their peculiar vices, and perhaps many ways of plaguing and puniſhing their ſubjects; but Nabis had not only all, but invented and practiſed ſuch acts of cruelty

Nabis ſucceeds Machanidas. Year after the Flood, 2803. Year before Chriſt, 196.

[d] Polyb. ubi ſupra. Plut. in vit. Philop. Liv. Hiſt lib. xxxiv.
[e] Plutarch. in vit. Philopœmen. Polyb. Fragment. lib. vii.

cruelty as were never heard of before, and have sunk into oblivion since. To all who were honest, brave, or noble, he was an open enemy, such as he could lay his hands on he murdered, such as were not immediately in his power he banished: But did he stop there? No. He sent some of his Cretan assassins after them where-ever they retired, who watched them so narrowly, that in the field, or at their tables, or in their beds, they found an opportunity to slay them. At home he reigned with a dissimulation, which some called wisdom. He kept up the state of a prince, he wore purple, was attended by guards, performed the functions of a first magistrate, kept an equal countenance, made use of smooth speeches, entertained numbers of spies and sycophants, and struck such a terror into all who were not so, that they durst not express their thoughts or their fears. Polybius tells us, that he had a painted image which resembled his wife, and this being clad in royal robes he introduced, when he fancied it impracticable to wheedle any Lacedæmonian out of his money; and such was the art with which this image was contrived, that, by touching certain secret springs, it catched any who were near it in its arms, and forced them to say any thing the tyrant pleased [f]. The distressed and dejected state of all Greece, which was now mightily divided, weak in its councils, and weaker still in the execution of them, and with all this mightily over-awed by the power of the Macedonian kings and the Roman republic, gave vast opportunities to the tyrant to encrease his dominions and to exalt his power. He in the midst of these confusions seized, under pretence of assisting some of the exiled citizens, on Argos, into which he put a garrison under the command of Pythagoras his son-in-law, a man of great abilities, and who was indeed the support of his tyranny. The Achæans immediately applied to the Romans, for they began to be affrighted themselves at the apprehensions of the tyrant's growing power. Titus Quintius the Roman general arriving in Greece, they quickly made him sensible of the mischiefs that would follow, if Nabis was permitted to go on; for, not contented with holding the prime part of Peloponnesus under his sway, he began to be ambitious of the empire of the sea, and to project such schemes as threatened disturbance even to the Romans themselves. Quintius marched immediately into the neighbourhood of Argos, and had some

[f] Id. Fragm. lib. xiii.

ſome thoughts of attacking the city, where on his approach a riſing was attempted, which iſſued in the deſtruction of thoſe who were deſirous to be free. After this he marched towards Lacedæmon itſelf, at which Nabis was exceedingly troubled; he ordered however, a general aſſembly of the people to be held without the city, whither as ſoon as they were come, he ſurrounded them with his troops; then he made a ſhort ſpeech, intimating the mighty danger they were in; for it is the mode of all tyrants to call themſelves and their private concerns the intereſt of their country; he then magnified the great pains he had taken in ſecuring all the poſts and avenues of Sparta, concluded, that ſince without ſpeaking he had done ſo much for their ſervice, they ought not now he did ſpeak to grudge doing ſomewhat for him, the rather, becauſe what he ſought concerned likewiſe their own ſafety; ſome there were amongſt them, he ſaid, who had given him juſt cauſe to ſuſpect their conduct, theſe therefore he was determined to ſeize and impriſon, till, the preſent danger being over, he might, which he greatly wiſhed, reſtore them again to liberty conſiſtent with his own and the public ſafety: Having made this goodly harangue, he cauſed fourſcore perſons of worth and honour to be arreſted, the unarmed multitude looking on with amazement, and that ſame night he cauſed them all to be murdered in priſon; a little afterwards, growing jealous of the Helotes, he ſeized a great number of them, cauſed them to be ſcourged in the ſtreets, till the kennels were diſcoloured with their blood, and then put them to death without mercy. After all, finding the Romans about to beſiege him, he reſolved to attempt a treaty, knowing that king Antiochus was meditating new ſtirs, and from thence concluded, that Quintius would be glad to come to ſome agreement with him. His hopes were not ill grounded, that great man, having nothing ſo much in view as the intereſt of Rome, readily agreed to meet him and hear his propoſals. Nabis at this interview made a long and well-compoſed oration, to which Quintius made but an indifferent return, yet promiſed to ſend him certain articles in writing; and thus this conference ended. The allies laboured hard to engage Quintius not to treat any more king Eumenes, who was in his camp, affirmed; that it was to no purpoſe, for that the tyrant would think no longer of peace than war was near him; Ageſipolis

king

king of Sparta, who with many other illuſtrious exiles waited on Quintius, inſiſted, that it would be unworthy of the Roman name to enter into a treaty with ſo execrable a perſon; the Achæans were of the ſame ſentiments, yet Quintius remained firm to his own; he ſaw clearly that they regarded their own intereſts, and thence he inferred, that he ought to mind none but thoſe of Rome; acting therefore on this motive, he ſent Nabis, as he had promiſed, an account of the terms whereon he would grant him peace, and thoſe terms were theſe: That he ſhould withdraw all his garriſons from Argos and its territories: that he ſhould deliver up all the ſhips of war he had taken, and of all his fleet ſhould retain no more than two galliots: That he ſhould deliver up ſuch as had fled to him from the Roman allies, and make reſtitution to the Meſſenians for the plundering their territories: That he ſhould reſtore to the Lacedæmonian exiles their wives and children: That he ſhould build neither caſtle nor city in his own territories nor in thoſe of his neighbours: That he ſhould give five ſuch hoſtages as the general would chuſe, and among them his own ſon: That he ſhould pay down a hundred talents, and that he ſhould continue paying fifty talents a year for eight years together; Nabis diſliked theſe conditions, and found means to make all the Lacedæmonians diſlike them, ſo that they determined to make an obſtinate defence; Quintius, perceiving nothing was to be done but by force, and having with him an army of fifty thouſand men, reſolved to attack the place, which accordingly he did ſeveral times, but was as often repulſed. At laſt he penetrated into the city, and his ſoldiers beginning to take poſt in the firſt long ſtreet, Nabis thought of nothing but making his eſcape; yet Pythagoras delivered him from this danger, by ſetting the ſtreet on fire at each end, and engaging the Lacedæmonians, who were yet fighting in front, to ſupply the riſing flames with fuel. The Roman ſoldiers were forced again to withdraw, but Nabis was ſo thoroughly frightened, that with much ado he procured peace on the terms before ſpecified, which was hardly concluded before advice came, that the Argives had delivered themſelves by expelling his garriſons. When Nabis was free from the neighbourhood of the Roman army, he began to caſt about in his mind how he might extricate himſelf from the miſchiefs he laboured under; for he could not bear the thoughts of loſing at once thoſe dominions, which he had had been ſo long and with ſo much pains acquiring. He was eſpecially irritated at beholding himſelf without a ſea-port, and little ſet by amongſt his neighbours; he therefore began to treat privately with Antiochus and the Ætolians for creating new diſturbances in Peloponneſus, and having received from them great promiſes, he began to act againſt the Achæans and their allies. Gythium the ſea-port of Sparta he beſieged and recovered; but after that and a ſlight victory at ſea, which he obtained againſt Philopœmen, he was routed at land, rather for want of abilities as a general in himſelf, than any fault in his ſoldiers. Philopœmen, though he could not hinder the taking of Gythium, yet reſolved to terrify the tyrant by marching directly towards Lacedæmon, which had the conſequence he expected and deſired, ſince Nabis drew his forces together, and led them with the utmoſt diligence to the relief of his capital; by this forced march he fronted the Achæan army within ten miles of the city, the tyrant ſeizing on this occaſion a very ſtrong camp, where Philopœmen intended to have lain that night. This great general, perceiving that his firſt deſign was rendered abortive, immediately formed a ſecond, and, ſince he could not ſpoil Sparta, reſolved to content himſelf with deſtroying an army every way ſuperior to his own. There lay between the camps a little rivulet, from which both the Achæans and Lacedæmonians were to fetch water; but it was conſiderably nearer to the former than to the latter. Philopœmen therefore ſent a great detachment to take poſt privately in a copſe which bordered on the river; when the troops of Nabis came to water their horſes and to fill their veſſels for the camp, this detachment ſuddenly attacked them and cut many of the light-armed ſoldiers in pieces. About the ſame time he ſent one of his auxiliary ſoldiers as a deſerter to Nabis, with inſtructions to give him information, that the Achæans deſigned to move in the night, in order to get between him and Lacedæmon. The tyrant, affrighted at this news, as ſoon as it was throughly dark, quitted a camp which Philopœmen could never have forced, and, leaving only a few light-armed troops in his intrenchments, marched with all the troops he could towards Sparta. Philopœmen foreſeeing this attacked his camp as ſoon as he was out of it, and ſo haraſſed his army with his light-armed mercenaries, that Nabis found himſelf conſtrained to retire into the neighbouring woods, where he remained all the next day. Philopœmen in this ſpace recalling his light-armed forces, left them in the camp which he had taken, and, with his troops that were ſtill freſh, marched with great ſecrecy, and ſeized the paſſes which led to Lacedæmon, not doubting, but at the approach of night the tyrant would march again; this fell out as he expected, and as he had ſeized the avenues, the forces of Nabis were in a manner at his mercy, and he uſed his advantage ſo well, that the tyrant with a very ſmall part of his army got into the city, covered with diſgrace, and unable to hinder Philopœmen from ſpoiling the country, which he did for thirty days, and then retired, leaving Nabis much dejected and with ſmall forces to continue the war. His recovery of Gythium furniſhed him at preſent with little comfort, for the enemy being maſter of all the country, he could ſcarcely hold any correſpondence therewith; beſides, his navy was very inconſiderable, and he had every day repeated advice that the Romans intended ſuddenly to ſend a new army into Greece. The Lacedæmonians themſelves appeared diſſatisfied, which made him afraid to lead his ſoldiers without the city; and pent up within it they were ſcarce of any uſe. In the midſt of theſe diſtractions, he placed all his hopes in the Ætolians, who had indeed done a great deal of miſchief in Greece, and had been ſtrongly inſtrumental in drawing him into this war. To theſe he diſpatched courier after courier, not with the haughty command of a tyrant, but with the humble ſupplications of a diſtreſſed ally; he reminded them, that for their ſakes only he had ſo precipitately entered into this war, at a time when none elſe cared to own them for allies; he ſhewed them truly the nature of his diſtreſs, hoping that it would make their relief the quicker and more effectual; but it produced quite a contrary effect, the Ætolians being fit confederates for ſuch a tyrant. As ſoon as they had given audience to his meſſengers, they diſpatched them with large aſſurances of ready aſſiſtance, while in the mean time they conſulted what for their intereſt would be fitteſt to be done; the reſult of their conſultations was, that in the days of his proſperity, and when he had a ſtrong army of mercenaries at his command, Nabis was their good ally, and deſerved all poſſible regard; but in the preſent ſituation of things, when his his forces were in a manner cut off, and he ſcarce able to maintain himſelf in Sparta, 'twould better ſerve their purpoſes to remove him out of the way and take the city to themſelves. This counſel taken and approved, a thouſand foot and thirty horſe were choſen to march to Lacedæmon under the command of Alexamenus. When they were ready to depart, the horſemen were ſent for into the great council, where they received the following ſhort and pithy inſtructions; that they were not ſent to aſſiſt Nabis to make war upon the Achæans, or for any other purpoſe whatſoever, than to obey Alexamenus, and to do what he directed, let it be what it would. Thus diſmiſſed, they marched under the command of that general to Sparta, where they found Nabis very little ſatisfied with ſo ſmall a reinforcement. Alexamenus did all he could to encourage him, he told him, the Ætolians by ſending him intended no more than to give a ſpecimen of their good will, inſtructing him alſo to inform him, that if his neceſſities required it, they would, whenever he requeſted it, march with the utmoſt forces they could raiſe to his relief; he likewiſe informed him, that Antiochus was reſolved to make war on the Romans, and intended to cover Greece with his armies and the ſea with his ſhips; that many of the Greek ſtates were inclined to his party, and that the Ætolians were about to muſter all their troops before the king's commiſſioners ſhortly, which was the reaſon why they ſent ſo few under his command. The tyrant, encouraged by theſe conſolatory ſpeeches, began, by the advice of Alexamenus, to exerciſe his forces without the city, that he might at once give them courage, and the Achæans apprehenſions. At theſe exerciſes the Ætolian general failed not to aſſiſt; his guard of horſe keeping, according to his order, aloof, and he ſometimes riding up to them as it were to give them orders. Theſe growing at laſt into daily practices, the Lacedæmonians ſinking again into a timorous obedience, Nabis entertained freſh hopes of regaining all his dominions, and of revenging himſelf upon the Romans for the injuries which he conceived they had done him. The Spartan guards, which Alexamenus looked upon as the beſt corps in the tyrant's army, he adviſed to be poſted, phalanx-wiſe. beyond the reſt, offering ſuch plauſible reaſons, that Nabis readily yielded to it, which was the only ſtep wanting to his ruin. When the day came whereon Alexamenus reſolved to execute his great and deſperate deſign, he behaved towards Nabis with more than ordinary complaiſance; he commended the appearance and diſcipline of his troops, applauded his cavalry, promiſed him the ſupremacy in Peloponneſus, and perceiving that his complaiſance had wrought a proper effect, the tyrant teſtifying by his looks and geſtures the higheſt ſatisfaction, Alexamenus ſuddenly wheeled off, and riding up to his troop of Ætolians, bid them remember the inſtructions they had received when they were firſt choſen for this ſervice. Having ſaid this, he turned the head of his horſe, and rode with a full carreer againſt Nabis whom he overthrew, and his Ætolians, riding immediately after him, one after another buried their ſpears in the boſom of the tyrant. His guards were hardly informed of what paſt till he was dead; and then, not knowing for whom they fought, they forbore fighting at all. The reſt of the Lacedæmonians looked on with a mixture of joy and terror, joy, that the tyrant was dead, who had ſo long and ſo cruelly oppreſt them, terror, at beholding ſo ſtrange an accident; the reaſons of which they knew not, and of its conſequences were therefore afraid. Alexamenus and his Ætolians, taking advantage of their amazement, marched directly into the city, their chief breaking into the tyrant's palace and rifling all his treaſures; the ſoldiers ſhortly after followed his example, ſo that in a ſhort time the Lacedæmonians looked on the murder of Nabis as their misfortune; but conſidering how little it became the inhabitants of the famous Sparta to look on and ſee their riches carried away by foreigners, they without much ado took a child whoſe name was Laconicus, and who on account of his being deſcended from the royal family was bred up by Nabis; him they ſet on horſeback, and gathering about him, they ſurrounded many of the Ætolians and put them to the ſword, after a while they broke into the palace, where they ſlew Alexamenus and thoſe who were with him; they forced likewiſe a temple of Diana to which many of the Ætolians were fled; all of whom they put without mercy to the ſword. When they were in the midſt of this confuſion, of which none had projected any iſſue, Philopœmen arrived, ſome friends of his having poſted to him with the account of the death of Nabis; the forces he had were few, nor did he from them conceive any hopes of taking the city; on the contrary he did what Alexamenus ought to have done, that is, he convinced the Lacedæmonians of the madneſs of their proceedings, and engaged them, ſince they they had ſo happily recovered their freedom, to unite themſelves to the Achæans, reaping thus by his virtue all the fruits the Ætolians expected from their treachery.

It may indeed ſeem ſtrange, that the Spartans, who had entertained ſuch generous notions of liberty, ſubmitted patiently for ſo long a tract of time to the arbitrary commands of lawleſs tyrants; but this wonder will be in a great meaſure taken off, if we conſider two things; Firſt, That the manners of the Lacedæmonians were greatly corrupted, which is indeed the very baſis of ſlavery; there can be no ſuch thing as bending the necks of virtuous people; but when once men are abandoned to their vices and become ſlaves to their paſſions, they readily ſtoop to thoſe who can gratify them; and this was the caſe of the majority of the inhabitants of Sparta at this time. Secondly, thoſe amongſt them who were diſtinguiſhed by their merit and their morals, were on this very account proſcribed by the tyrants and hated by their creatures; ſo that they were forced to forſake their country and leave it to groan under a power which they were unable to reſiſt. To this we may add, that ſuch as were of mild diſpoſitions flattered themſelves with the hopes of ſeeing better times, and even in theſe conſoled themſelves with the thought, that Sparta yet retained her independency, and was not ſubjected to any other ſtate [g] (Y).

g Tit. Liv. lib. xxxiv. Plutarch. in vit. Philop. Juſtin. lib. xxx. c. 4. lib. xxxi. c. 1, 2.

(Y) There is a point or two in the Lacedæmonian hiſtory, which though they have been handled in a curious manner already, require to be conſidered more largely. Aratus undoubtedly intended the preſervation of the Grecian liberty, eſpecially from the Macedonian power, but at the ſame time as certainly intended to engage all the Peloponneſian ſtates in the Achæan league, which was abſolutely inconſiſtent with their retaining any monarchical form. On this account it was that he hated and made war upon all the little princes in his neighbourhood, whom he ſtiled tyrants and proſecuted as ſuch, as the Achæans continued ever after to do. If Sparta had acceded to the Achæan league, it is very poſſible, that Greece might have vindicated its freedom, for ſome time at leaſt, againſt both the Macedonians and the Romans; but Sparta had been too long at the head of Peloponneſus to think of changing her government at the firſt motion of Aratus and the Achæans, and therefore gladly accepted the propo-

ſal

ſal of Cleomenes to reſtore her antient form of government, and with it her antient luſtre (75). Aratus, ſeeing that this would entirely overturn his ſcheme, immediately called Cleomenes tyrant, and as ſuch would have pulled him down. While the Spartans, and thoſe who ſided with the Spartans, acknowledged him the vindicator of the antient Grecian liberty, one who deſired to leave all cities to be governed according to their own laws, as well as to preſerve kingly government in Sparta. It is true, that Machanidas and Nabis pretended to carry on the ſame deſign, the latter actually dividing the lands as Cleomenes had done; but this they did with a view to the aggrandizing of themſelves and their families, and the ſupporting of a dominion unlawfully maintained, which was far from being his caſe (76). That in this and in a former note we have fairly ſtated theſe matters, will clearly appear from the ſubſequent hiſtory of the Achæans, wherein it will be found, that there was no depending upon the Lacedæmonians, till their manners were wholly changed and the Lycurgic inſtitutions rooted out by force. Now whether ſuch proceedings as theſe of ruining a conſtitution that did not ſuit with their league, or Cleomenes's ſchemes for ſupporting every ſtate in its priſtine form, ought with greateſt juſtice to be ſtiled a deſire of beſtowing liberty to Greece, the reader muſt determine.

(75) Polyb. Hiſt. lib. iv. Plutarch. in vit. Arati. (76) Tit. Liv. lib. xxxiv.

CHAP.

CHAP. XX.

The History of the several states of Greece, from the beginning of the Achæan league to its dissolution, and thence succinctly to the present time.

SECT. I.

The History of Achaia.

ALL Greece, in the ages we are now to write of, may be reduced to three states, viz. Achaia, Ætolia, and Athens. There were, 'tis true, at this time several other republics in Greece; but as they only acted an under-part, and in conjunction sometimes with one, and sometimes with another, of the more powerful states just now mentioned, their histories are so interwoven with those of the greater republics, that to deliver them separately would be only swelling the work with needless repetitions, as the reader will find in the perusal of the following sheets. We shall begin with the history of Achaia, by far the most considerable republic of Greece in its declining times; after having premised, that the name of Achaia was used by the antients in three different senses. In the earlier ages it comprehended all the provinces of that great continent, which the geographers, strictly speaking, call Greece; that is, Attica, Megaris, Locris, Phocis, Bœotia, the territory of Thebes, Ætolia, and Doris. In after-ages it was confined to that country in Peloponnesus which was possessed by the Achæans, and extended along the bay of Corinth and the Ionian sea, from the confines of Sicyon to the territory of Elis. In the Roman times the name of Achaia compriſed not only all Peloponnesus, but such other cities beyond the isthmus as had entered into the Achæan league; upon the dissolution of which all Greece was by a decree of the Roman senate divided into two provinces, viz. that of Macedonia, containing Macedonia and Thessaly, and that of Achaia, which took in all the other states of Greece. We have already described the country [a], and shall therefore now proceed to the hiſtory of a people, that not only maintained their own liberties amidſt innumerable tyrants, but reſtored moſt of the Greek cities to their antient freedom.

[a] Vol. vi. p. 85.

ACHAIA, a ſtate originally of ſmall account, roſe by degrees to ſuch a height of reputation and proſperity, as to rival and eclipſe the moſt powerful ſtates of Greece. This great increaſe of power was not owing either to the vaſt numbers or extraordinary valour of its inhabitants, but ſolely to its wholeſome laws and happy conſtitution. For the Achæans, after having ſhaken off the tyrannical yoke of regal power, formed to themſelves, on the plan of a democracy, a new ſyſtem of government, which, obtaining by degrees in all the cities of their ſmall republic, united them into one body, and at the ſame time left them in full poſſeſſion of their reſpective liberties, and quite independent of each other. Thus the Achæans were not only joined together by a firm alliance, and governed by the ſame laws, but moreover had the ſame money, weights, and meaſures, the ſame magiſtrates, council, and judges, and in ſhort every thing ſo uniform, that all Achaia ſeemed but one city. This invited many of the Peloponneſians to embrace their form of government and accede to the Achæan alliance, while in the mean time the authors of this inſtitution reaped no advantage by their acceſſion; for no ſooner did any city receive their laws, but it was admitted to the enjoyment of the ſame rights and privileges with the reſt. Neither was the fame of their wiſe laws and mild government confined within the narrow bounds of Peloponneſus, but even reached the Greek colonies in Italy, where the Crotoniates, the Sybarites, and the Cauloniates, agreed to adopt the Achæan laws and govern their ſtates conformably [b] (A). The Lacedæmonians and Thebans had had ſuch an eſteem of their impartial juſtice and equity, that they choſe them after the famous battle of Leuctra to compoſe ſome differences that were ſtill ſubſiſting between them. The contending parties were not induced, as our author obſerves [c], to refer their differences to the arbitration of the Achæans by any argument of their greatneſs or power, there being no ſtate at that time in all Greece that was not ſuperior to them in both theſe reſpects, but merely in conſideration of their juſtice and probity, which had acquired them the good opinion of all the world.

[b] Polyb. lib. ii. Pauſan. in Achaic.

(A) Polybius tells (1) us, that great diſturbances ariſing among the Greek cities in that part of Italy which was called Magna Græcia, embaſſadors were diſpatched to them from all parts of Greece; but that the council only of the Achæans was choſen to cure thoſe great evils and compoſe the diſſenſions; which they did with ſuch ſucceſs, that all thoſe cities by common conſent agreed to imitate them, and to form themſelves according to the example of the Achæan republic. Whereupon uniting in one body they built a temple to Jupiter Homorius, appointing that place for the congreſs of their general aſſemblies.

(1) Polyb. lib. ii.

THIS form of government continued from the expulſion of Gyges the laſt king of Achaia to the time of Alexander the Great, upon whoſe death this little republic was involved in all the calamities that are inſeparable from diſcord. The ſpirit of patriotiſm no longer prevailed among them, each city purſuing their private intereſt to the prejudice and deſtruction of their neighbours. As theſe diſſenſions and emulations were artificially ſown and carefully fomented by the Macedonian princes, ſo they failed not to take their advantage of them; for Demetrius, Caſſander, and Antigonus Gonatus, ſeizing on ſome of their cities, obliged them to receive the Macedonian yoke. In this unhappy ſituation they changed maſters as often as Macedon did ſovereigns, and were moreover enſlaved by tyrants of their own, who as they eſpouſed the Macedonian intereſt, ſo they were ſupported with the whole ſtrength of that kingdom [d].

THE Achæans, accuſtomed to live according to their own laws and inured to liberty and freedom, could not brook ſo ſlaviſh a ſubjection, and therefore in the 124th olympiad, which was coincident with the expedition of Pyrrhus into Italy, they began to revive their antient union and return to their former aſſociation. The inhabitants of Patra and Dyma gave the firſt example of this happy change. Five years after thoſe of Ægium, having driven out the Macedonian garriſon, acceded to the alliance. The inhabitants of Bura followed their example, having firſt killed their prince or tyrant; and ſoon after thoſe of Ceraunia incorporated their city into the ſame Achæan body, Iſeas their tyrant reſigning the dominion, upon promiſe of indemnity for what was paſſed [e].

The Achæan league revived. Year of the Flood, 2723. Before Chriſt 280.

THE cities we have mentioned were the firſt that revived the antient aſſociation, continuing for the ſpace of twenty-twenty-five years to maintain the ſame form of government without being joined by any others. But at laſt the good order that reigned in this little republic, where liberty and equality, with a ſincere zeal for juſtice and the public welfare, were the fundamental principles of their government, drew ſeveral neighbouring cities to join them. Sicyon was one of the firſt that acceded in this manner, being induced thereunto by Aratus (B) the Sicyonian, who at the age of twenty

[c] Polyb. ibid. [d] Polyb. & Pauſan. ubi ſupra. [e] Idem, ibid.

(B) Aratus, a native of Sicyon, played on this occaſion a noble part on the ſtage of action, which rendered his name famous all over Greece. Sicyon, having long mourned under the yoke of her domeſtic tyrants, attempted to ſhake it off by devolving the power on Clinias, the father of Aratus and one of her beſt citizens. The government began to flouriſh aud aſſume a new form under his wiſe conduct, when Abantidas found means to diſconcert his meaſures, and take the whole power into his own hands. He killed Clinias, and with him all thoſe who ſtood up for the liberties of their country; and would have likewiſe deſtroyed Aratus, who was then but ſeven years old, had not the infant eſcaped with ſome others amidſt the diſorders and confuſion that filled the houſe when his father was killed. As he was wandering about the city in the utmoſt conſternation and diſtreſs, he accidentally entered the houſe of the tyrant's ſiſter, with a deſign to conceal himſelf there till the tumult was over, for he knew not to whom it belonged. The tyrant's ſiſter, being perſuaded that this deſtitute infant had taken refuge under her roof by the impulſe of ſome deity, cauſed him the enſuing night to be ſecretly conveyed to Argos, where he was educated with the utmoſt care by ſome hoſpitable friends of his father. The new tyranny had paſſed through ſeveral hands, when Aratus, being come to man's eſtate, began to entertain thoughts of reſcuing his country from the oppreſſion it groaned under. He was greatly reſpected both for his birth and the many excellent qualities which he began already to diſplay on ſeveral occaſions. The Sicyonian exiles, diſcovering in him an early averſion to tyrants, began to caſt their eyes upon him, as a perſon deſtined by heaven to be one day their deliverer. Neither were they deceived in their conjecture. For Aratus had ſcarce attained the twentieth year of his age, when he formed a confederacy againſt Nicocles, who was tyrant of Sicyon at that time, and purſued his meaſures with ſo much prudence and ſecrecy, that, notwithſtanding the tyrant kept a vigilant eye on his conduct, he ſcaled the walls of Sicyon, and entered the city by night, before Nicocles had any notice or even ſuſpicion of his deſign. However, he had the good luck to make his eſcape, leaving Aratus in poſſeſſion of the city. The next morning the people being aſſembled in a tumultuous manner, without knowing what twenty years reſcued his country from tyranny and reſtored his countrymen to the enjoyment of their former liberties. Eight years after he had engaged his country in the Achæan league, he took by ſurprize Acro-Corinth (C), and alſo the what had been tranſacted, a herald proclaimed with a loud voice, that Aratus the ſon of Clinias invited the citizens to reſume their antient liberty. Theſe joyful words were no ſooner heard, but the whole multitude, with repeated ſhouts and loud acclamations, flocked to the tyrant's palace, and burnt it down to the ground in a few minutes. Thus was Sicyon delivered from its tyrants without the loſs of one ſingle man on either ſide; for Aratus commanded his followers to abſtain from ſlaughter, ſaying, that an action of this nature ought not to be polluted with the blood of his fellow-citizens. This circumſtance gave him no leſs joy than the action itſelf.

Sicyon began then to recover its antient ſplendor; but Aratus was not yet quite eaſed from his inquietude and perplexity. Antigonus king of Macedon had ſupported and protected Nicocles, and was ready to lay hold of the firſt opportunity to make himſelf maſter of the city, or eſtabliſh in it ſome other tyrant: ſeeds of ſedition were artfully ſown among the citizens by his partizans and emiſſaries; and Aratus was extremely apprehenſive of their effects. He therefore concluded, that the ſafeſt and moſt prudent conduct in ſo delicate a juncture would be to unite Sicyon with the Achæan league, which he did accordingly, ſtrengthening the league with all the forces of his country, and entering himſelf among the cavalry for the ſervice of that ſtate (2).

(C) The iſthmus of Corinth unites the continent of Greece with that of Peloponneſus. The citadel of Corinth, known by the name of Acro-Corinth, was ſituated on a high mountain between thoſe two continents, which are there divided by a very narrow neck of land; ſo that this fortreſs cuts off all communication by land from the inner part of the iſthmus, and can awe, if well garriſoned, all Greece; for which reaſon Philip of Macedon uſed to call it the fetters of Greece.

This fortreſs Antigonus had taken by ſurprize, with a deſign to enſlave all Peloponneſus; but Aratus wreſted it out of his hand by an action equal, in the opinion of Plutarch, to the moſt celebrated enterprizes of the antient heroes of Greece. After he had been long meditating with himſelf by what means he might gain that important place, he was by accident furniſhed with an opportunity of accompliſhing his deſign.

One Erginus, an inhabitant of Corinth, had contracted an intimate acquaintance with a banker of Sicyon, who was a particular

(2) Plut. in Arat.

the city of Megara, from the Macedonians, uniting them both to the Achæans. The cities of Træzene, Epidaurus, and ticular friend of Aratus. As the citadel happened one day to be the ſubject of their converſation, Erginus told his friend, that in going to viſit his brother, who was a ſoldier of the garriſon, he had obſerved a narrow track hewn in the rock, which led up to that part of the hill where the wall of the fortreſs was very low. The banker, who was very attentive to this account, aſked his friend with a ſmile, whether he and his brother were deſirous to make their fortunes. Erginus underſtood him, and promiſed to ſound his brother, by name Diocles, on that head. A few days after he returned to Sicyon, and engaged with the banker to conduct Aratus to that part of the mountain where the wall was but fifteen feet high, adding, that his brother was ready to concur with him in every other particular relating to the enterprize. Aratus promiſed on his part to reward them with ſixty talents if the affair ſhould ſucceed; but as he was not maſter of ſuch a ſum, and the borrowing it might create ſuſpicion, he pawned all his plate, together with his wife's jewels, to the banker, as a ſecurity for the promiſed reward.

Aratus having thus engaged the two brothers, and ſurmounted a great many difficulties, each of which was ſufficient to diſcourage any other but him, the troops were ordered to paſs the night under arms. He then ſelected four hundred men, furniſhed them with ſcaling-ladders, and led them to one of the gates of the city; for the citadel was on the top of a ſteep rock within the city. They ſcaled the walls without being obſerved, Erginus having, with the aſſiſtance of his brother and ſome others that were gained over by him, killed the centinels that were there upon duty. As they were marching in great ſilence through the city, they met with a ſmall guard that was going the rounds, and killed them all but one, who making his eſcape alarmed the city. But Aratus, notwithſtanding the alarm, continued his march, and arriving at the foot of the rock, on which the fortreſs ſtood, began to climb up at the head of his men. But miſſing the path that was ſtruck out of the rock, by reaſon of a thick fog which roſe from the ſea at their firſt entering the city, Aratus was not a little perplexed. The city was already alarmed, all the ſtreets, and even the ramparts, blazed with innumerable lights, and the trumpets ſounded to arms on all ſides. While he was thus perplexed, the fog all on a ſudden cleared up, and the moon, returning to ſhine with the ſame brightneſs as before, diſcovered the intricate windings of the track, which he followed at the head of a hundred of his boldeſt men, and arrived with much ado at the ſpot which had been deſcribed to him. But he found the garriſon, which was by this time and Megalopolis, were likewiſe prevailed upon by him to join in the alliance, the tyrants making a voluntary reſignation of the authority they had uſurped over their fellow-citizens [f]. The tyrants of the Argives, of the Hermionians, and the Phliaſians, following their example, were likewiſe received into the alliance.

As theſe glorious ſucceſſes raiſed the reputation of the Achæan league, ſo they created no ſmall jealouſy in the neighbouring ſtates. But before we proceed to the wars which they were ſoon involved in by their jealous and reſtleſs neighbours, we ſhall give a ſuccinct account of their happy conſtitution. All the cities ſubject to the Achæan league time alarmed, ready to receive him. Whereupon he immediately diſpatched Erginus to acquaint the body of three hundred men, which he had left behind with orders to cover his rear, with the danger he was in. While theſe were waiting at the foot of the rock drawn up in a cloſe body, Archelaus who commanded the troops of king Antigonus, appeared at the head of a conſiderable band with a deſign to mount the hill and attack Aratus in the rear. The three hundred Sicyonians at his approach concealed themſelves among the rocks; but he was no ſooner paſt than they ſtarted out, and fell upon him with ſuch reſolution, that he was ſoon put to the rout. This action was ſcarce over, when Erginus arrived, and acquainted them, that Aratus was engaged with the enemy, and in great need of immediate aſſiſtance. Upon this notice the victorious troops, conducted by Erginus, began to climb up the rock, proclaiming their approach with loud ſhouts to animate their friends, and ſtrike new terror into the enemy. The light of the moon reflecting on their arms, and their ſhouts, redoubled by the ecchoes among the rocks and hollow places in the midnight ſilence, made them appear more numerous than they really were. Whereupon the enemy retired after a faint reſiſtance from the wall, and left Aratus abſolute maſter of the citadel. In the mean time the reſt of the troops arriving from Sicyon were not only received with open arms, but aſſiſted by the Corinthians in ſeizing all the Macedonians that were in the city.

[f] Polyb. ibid. Plut. in Arato.

Aratus having ſecured the citadel went from thence to the city, and having aſſembled the people in the theatre, acquainted them in a long diſcourſe with the particulars of the Achæan league, and exhorted them to accede to it. They unanimouſly agreed to join in the alliance; whereupon Aratus reſtored to them the keys of their city, which till then had never been in their power ſince the time of Philip the father of Alexander (3).

(3) Plut in Arat.

league were governed by the great council or general assembly of the whole nation. To this assembly or diet each of the confederate cities had a right to send a certain number of deputies, who were elected in their respective cities by a plurality of voices. By this means no resolutions were taken, but what were equally advantageous to the whole confederacy, and the interests of each particular city so consulted as to leave no room for complaints. As the supreme and legislative power was lodged in the assembly, it was constantly convened twice a year, in the spring and autumn; but seldom out of these stated times, unless upon some very urgent occasion. In these meetings they enacted laws, disposed of the vacant employments, declared war, made peace, concluded alliances, &c. If any city of the league did not acquiesce to the determinations and ordinances of the diet, or refused to furnish their quotas in time of war, they were compelled to it by dint of arms. The chief magistrate of the whole league, called by the Greeks Strategos, and by the Latins Prætor, was chosen in the general assembly by the majority of votes. This employment was both a civil and military one, it being the Prætor's province to preside in the diet and command the army. They chose at first two Prætors, but it was soon thought advisable to reduce them to one; and the first who enjoyed that dignity alone was Marcus the Carian, who was succeeded by the famous Aratus. The prætor and other magistrates were appointed in the vernal assemblies, and seldom continued two years successively in the same employment. The former was vested with great power, especially in time of war; but at the same time liable to be called to an account by the general assembly, and punished without any regard to his dignity, if convicted of misdemeanor or any other crime. The demiurgi were next in power to the prætor, and therefore stiled by Polybius and Livy the supreme magistrates of the Achæans. They were ten in number, chosen by the general assembly from among the most eminent men of the whole league, for prudence, equity, and experience. It was their office to assist with their advice the prætor, who was to lay nothing before the assembly but what had been previously approved of by the major part of the demiurgi. In the prætor's absence the whole management of civil affairs devolved upon them; and in some extraordinary cases they were even impowered to summon the general assembly out of the stated times.

Few of their laws have reached our times; however, from the writings of the antients we have collected the five following, which we find to have been religiouſly obſerved while the republic continued in a flouriſhing condition. 1. That an extraordinary aſſembly was not to be ſummoned at the requeſt of foreign embaſſadors, unleſs they firſt notified in writing to the prætor and demiurgi the ſubject of their embaſſy. 2. That no city ſubject to the league ſhould ſend any embaſſy to a foreign prince or ſtate, without the conſent and approbation of the general diet. 3. That no member of the aſſembly ſhould accept of preſents from foreign princes under any pretence whatſoever. 4. That no prince, ſtate or city ſhould be admitted into the league without the conſent of the whole alliance. 5. That the general aſſembly ſhould never ſit above three days. Theſe laws have been explained at length and illuſtrated with many uſeful obſervations by a modern writer of no mean character [e], to whom we refer the reader and reſume the thread of our hiſtory.

The Ætolians, conceiving no ſmall jealouſy at the growing power and extraordinary ſucceſs of the Achæans, began to inſtil the ſame into the neighbouring ſtates, with a view of breaking the union of thoſe cities that were already joined, and preventing others from entering into the league. The ſenſe of the benefits which they had a little before received from the friendſhip of the Achæans, during their war with Antigonus, with-held them from openly declaring war againſt their benefactors. However, they left no ſtone unturned to ſtir up the Lacedæmonians, and engage their king Cleomenes in a war againſt the Achæans; wherein they ſucceeded to their wiſh; for Cleomenes at their inſtigation having built a fortreſs in the territory of the Megalopolitans called Athenæum, the Achæans interpreted that as an open rupture, and declared in a general aſſembly, that the Lacedæmonians ſhould be repu-

ted

[e] Martini Shoockii. Reſpub. Achæor. & Veient.

ted enemies [f]. Such was the beginning of the war, which was called the Cleomenic war (C).

The Cleomenic war. Year of the flood 2771. Before Chriſt 232.

THIS declaration of the Achæan confederacy was no ſooner heard at Sparta, but the Ephori commanded their troops to take the field under the conduct of Cleomenes, who, coming up with the Achæans near Pallantium, offered them battle. But Aratus declaring againſt an engagement, Ariſtomachus the Achæan general made a retreat, which drew ſevere reproaches upon Aratus, both from his own countrymen and from the enemy, whoſe army did not amount to five thouſand men in the whole; whereas that of the Achæans conſiſted of twenty thouſand foot and a thouſand horſe [g]. Not long after the two armies met again, when the Achæans were defeated; but Aratus, having rallied in the flight what troops he could, marched ſtrait to Mantinea, and, before the enemy could have any ſuſpicion of his deſign, made himſelf maſter of that important place. This advantage was ſoon counter-ballanced by the loſs of another battle, wherein great numbers of the Achæans were ſlain with Lyſiades their general, while they were purſuing with two much eagerneſs and in diſorder the Lacedæmonians, who had given way and feigned a retreat. After this victory Cleomenes ad-

[f] Idem, ibid. [g] Plut. in Cleom.

(C) Plutarch (2) relates the occaſion of this war in a quite different manner; for he tells us, that Cleomenes, not being able to brook the authority of the Ephori, who engroſſed all the power to themſelves, leaving him only the empty title of king, reſolved to change the form of government; and as he was ſenſible that few would concur with him in that view, he imagined the accompliſhment of his deſign would be greatly facilitated by a war; and therefore endeavoured to embroil his city with the Achæans, who luckily for his purpoſe had given Sparta ſome occaſions of complaint; for Aratus, as our author tells us, not being able to prevail upon the Arcadians, who had eſpouſed the party of the Lacedæmonians, to abandon them and enter into the Achæan league, entered their territories in a hoſtile manner, ravaged their country, and in a word treated them as declared enemies. This opportunity Cleomenes laid hold of, and taking the field, treated the Achæans as they had done the Arcadians. According to this account the Achæans, and not the Lacedæmonians, were the aggreſſors.

(2) Plut. in Cleom.

advanced into the territories of Megalopolis, where his troops committed great devaſtations, and got a very conſiderable booty. To theſe ravages he added inſults, cauſing public games and plays to be exhibited in the ſight of the enemy, not that he had any ſatisfaction in ſuch ſhews and diverſions, but only with a view to convince the Achæans, that he entirely deſpiſed them, and was ſure of victory, having to deal with ſo contemptible a foe [h].

THE Achæans, now reduced to the laſt extremity and under apprehenſion of being enſlaved by the Lacedæmonians, eſpecially if they ſhould be joined by the Ætolians, who at that time were making great preparations for a war, began to entertain thoughts of concluding a peace upon any terms. But Aratus, dreading the conſequence of a treaty ſet on foot between his diſpirited countrymen and a victorious enemy, uſed his utmoſt efforts to divert them from it, and at the ſame time had recourſe to an expedient which no ways redounded to his honour. This was to engage Antigonus king of Macedon in this war againſt the Lacedæmonians, which opened a way to the Macedonians into Greece.

The Achæans invite Antigonus into Greece. Year of the flood 2776. Before Chriſt 227.

ARATUS knew that Antigonus had great cauſe to be diſſatisfied with his former proceedings; but he was likewiſe ſenſible, that princes have neither friends nor enemies, but meaſure amities and enmities by the rules of intereſt. However, he would not openly enter into a negotiation of this nature, being well aware, that Cleomenes and the Ætolians would oppoſe it, and that the Achæans themſelves would have reaſon to deſpair, if they ſhould ſee their general applying to their enemy. He therefore reſolved to proſecute his purpoſe with ſuch caution as to leave no room for ſuſpicion, and to carry on his meaſures ſo as to keep them undiſcovered. He was not ignorant, that, the Megalopolitans, by their neighbourhood to the Lacedæmonians, were moſt expoſed to the incurſions of the enemies, and conſequently, as they were greatly inclined to the houſe of Macedon, for the many favours they had received at the hand of Philip ſon of Amyntas, they would reſort for ſuccour to Antigonus and the Macedonians. Having therefore gained over to his ſcheme Nicophanes and Cercidas, two principal citizens of Megalopolis and well qualified for conducting the enterprize, by their means he brought brought it ſo about, that the Megalopolitans decreed to ſend embaſſadors to the aſſembly of the Achæans, begging leave to ſollicit ſuccours from Antigonus. Nicophanes and Cercidas were themſelves ſent to the Achæans with orders to proceed to Antigonus if they approved the propoſition. The general aſſembly, having given audience to the embaſſadors, and reflecting that they were not in a condition to yield them any effectual ſuccours by reaſon of their own great ſtreights, aſſented to their propoſal, and granted them leave to purſue their orders. When they received audience of Antigonus, they touched upon the affairs of their own country in a few words, but enlarged, purſuant to the inſtructions of Aratus, on the imminent danger to which the king himſelf would be expoſed, ſhould the alliance, which was then talked of between the Ætolians and Cleomenes, take place. They repreſented to him, that, if the united forces of thoſe two ſtates ſhould gain over the Achæans the advantages they expected, the ambition of Cleomenes and the Ætolians would never be ſatisfied with the ſingle conqueſt of Peloponneſus, but would aſpire to the empire of all Greece, which they could not compaſs without firſt deſtroying the Macedonian monarchy. They therefore begged him to deliberate maturely which was the ſafeſt counſel for him to take; whether to ſuccour the Achæans in oppoſition to Cleomenes and defeat his ambitious deſigns, or, by neglecting the occaſion of gaining the friendſhip of ſo great a people, become liable at laſt to ſuſtain a war in Theſſaly for the empire of Macedon, not only with the Lacedæmodians and Ætolians, but with the Achæans themſelves. To theſe remonſtrances they added, that, if the Ætolians continued their neutrality, the Achæans would be capable of ſupporting themſelves with their own forces; but, if on the other hand the Ætolians ſhould join the enemy, they muſt then entreat him to prevent with timely ſuccours the ruin of Peloponneſus, which might be attended with fatal conſequences to himſelf. They likewiſe took care to inſinuate, that Aratus would give ſuch ſecurity for his fair proceeding and ſincere intentions as ſhould be pleaſing to both parties, and that he himſelf would take upon him to demand aſſiſtance when he ſhould think it needful.

[h] Plut. ibid.

ANTIGONUS highly approved all theſe repreſentations, and with great pleaſure laid hold of the opportunity of engaengaging in the affairs of Greece. He likewiſe wrote an obliging letter to the Megalopolitans, aſſuring them of his aſſiſtance whenſoever the Achæans ſhould think fit to call for it. The embaſſadors having acquainted Aratus with the good diſpoſition wherein they found Antigonus towards the Achæans, he was not a little pleaſed to find his project ſucceed ſo well. He wiſhed indeed to have had no occaſion to call in foreign aids, and did all that lay in his power to prevent it; and though neceſſity obliged him to have recourſe to that prince, yet to ſhun the blame that might redound upon the authors of ſuch meaſures, he took care they ſhould appear as concerted by the Achæans without his privity. The Megalopolitans having acquainted the Achæans with the kind reception their deputies had met with at the court of Macedon, and ſent the letter of Antigonus to be read in the general aſſembly, moſt of them were for inviting that prince to march his army into Peloponneſus without further delay. But Aratus ſtanding up made a long ſpeech, exhorting them to try firſt, whether they could ſupport themſelves with their own forces; adding, that if after all their efforts fortune ſhould declare againſt them, it would then be time enough to have recourſe to their friends. His advice was approved by the whole aſſembly, and it was then concluded, that the Achæans ſhould employ their own forces only in the proſecution of the war [i].

THE war proved very unſucceſsful for the Achæans, who, being often worſted by Cleomenes, were obliged to abandon the field and retire into their ſtrong holds. Neither were theſe able to ſtop the career of the conqueror, who in one campaign took the cities of Caphyes, Pellene, Pheneus, Phlionte, Cleonæ, Epidaurus, Hermione, and Corinth itſelf. Theſe ſucceſſes allowed the Achæans no further time to deliberate; and accordingly, Aratus, at their entreaties, diſpatched his ſon to Antigonus, inviting that prince to come with all ſpeed to their aſſiſtance, and aſſuring him that, on his arrival, Acro-Corinth ſhould be put into his hands. Antigonus immediately began his march towards Peloponneſus, at the head of twenty-thouſand foot and fourteen hundred horſe, and arriving at the iſthmus encamped juſt oppoſite to Cleomenes, who had fortified with a ditch and rampart the whole ſpace between Acro-Corinth and the Onion hills. As Antigonus did not think it adviſeable, nor even practicable, to force his way through, and on the other hand had not a ſufficient quantity of proviſions to ſubſiſt his army till the Achæans joined him, he was preparing to decamp, and tranſport his troops by ſea to Sicyon. But in the mean time a meſſenger arriving at the camp acquainted Aratus, who was come to meet Antigonus, that the inhabitants of Argos had revolted from Cleomenes, and were then beſieging the citadel. Whereupon Aratus, with a detachment of fifteen hundred men, immediately put to ſea, and arriving at Epidaurus marched from thence to Argos, and made himſelf maſter both of the city and caſtle, after having defeated in a ſkirmiſh the partizans of Cleomenes, and killed Megiſtones who had been detached from the army to their relief [k]. This ſucceſs proved of great conſequence to the Achæans, and firſt of all gave riſe to the proſperity of the allies; for Cleomenes, hearing that Argos was taken, and being apprehenſive that the enemies would ſurround him, abandoned his lines and retired with great precipitation, firſt to Argos, and then to Mantinea. He appeared before Argos quite unexpected, and in that alarm got into the city, but could not keep it, the citadel being in the hands of Aratus, and Antigonus purſuing him cloſe with all his forces.

Antigonus arrives in Greece. Year of the flood 2778. Before Chriſt 225.

[i] Polyb ubi ſupra. Plut. in Cleom. & Arat.

ANTIGONUS, having thus entered Peloponneſus without the loſs of one ſingle man, advanced to Corinth, which immediately ſurrendered, and thence to Tegea, Mantinea, Orchomenos, Hærea, and Telphuſſa; all which places, terrified at the approach of the Macedonians, either voluntarily ſubmitted, or made but a faint reſiſtance. And now winter drawing near, he ſent home his troops, and went himſelf to Ægium to aſſiſt at the general aſſembly of the Achæans, where, after having acquainted them with the motives of his coming among them, he was choſen general of the confederate army, and the important caſtle of Acro-Corinth, was by a decree of the council made over to him.

Megalopolis taken and deſtroyed by Cleomenes.

IN the mean time Cleomenes, receiving intelligence that Antigonus had ſent home his army while he himſelf continued at Ægium, formed a deſign of ſurpriſing the city of Megalopolis, very conſiderable at that time, and no ways inferior in power and extent to Sparta itſelf. As the garriſon was not very ſtrong at that time, nor the guards very ſtrict in their duty, ſince Antigonus was near at hand and

[k] Plut. in Arat. & Cleom. Polyb. ubi ſupra.

and the enemy weakened with frequent loſſes, Cleomenes imagined he might eaſily get into the town in the night, provided he could gain ſome of the inhabitants over to his intereſt ; and accordingly applied himſelf to certain Meſſenians, who, having been baniſhed their country, had taken ſanctuary in Megalopolis. Being conducted by theſe, he arrived at the city by night, ſcaled the walls, and made himſelf maſter of the place without the leaſt oppoſition. Moſt of the inhabitants retired to Meſſene, whither Cleomenes ſent a herald to acquaint them, that he would reſtore them to the poſſeſſion of their city, provided they would renounce the Achæan league and join the Lacedæmonians. But they choſe rather to ſee themſelves diveſted of all that was moſt dear and valuable to them, than to violate the fidelity they had ſwore to their allies. The famous Philopœmen, whom we ſhall have frequently occaſion to mention in the ſequel of this hiſtory, contributed not a little to this generous reſolution. This refuſal highly enraged Cleomenes, who immediately gave up the town to be plundered, ſent all the ſtatues and pictures to Sparta, demoliſhed the houſes, threw down the walls, and committed ſo many outrages, that he left not ſo much as any appearance that it had ever been a peopled place [1].

Antigonus having ſent his troops, as we have already obſerved, into winter quarters in Macedonia, Cleomenes aſſembled his early in the ſpring with a deſign to put in execution a project, which in the opinion of the vulgar was the reſult of temerity and deſpair, but according to Polybius, a competent judge in matters of that nature, conducted with all imaginable prudence and ſagacity. As the Macedonians were diſperſed in their winter quarters, and Antigonus enjoying himſelf with his friends at Argos, without any other forces but a few mercenaries, Cleomenes taking the field made an irruption into the territories of Argos, laying waſte the whole country to the very gates of the city. What he propoſed in this enterprize was, to bring Antigonus to hazard an engagement, which in all probability he would have loſt ; or, if he declined it, to leſſen his reputation among the Achæans, and raiſe complaints againſt him, chiefly in the city of Argos. This project ſucceeded according to his expectation ; for the Argians, ſeeing their country ravaged and laid waſte under the king's eyes, while he continued inactive, aſſembled in a tumultuous manner at the palace gates, and with threats preſſed him either to take the field and protect his friends, or to reſign the command of their troops to thoſe who were leſs timorous than himſelf. But Antigonus was deaf to all their reproaches and remonſtrances, and, in ſpite of the many reflections that were publicly caſt upon him on that occaſion, kept within the walls of the city, and tamely beheld the enemy inſulting him at the very gates. Thus Cleomenes having frightened the enemy and inſpired his own men with new courage, returned loaded with booty to Sparta. In the beginning of the ſummer, Antigonus, being deſirous to retrieve the reputation he had undeſervedly loſt among the Achæans, took the field with an army of twenty-eight thouſand foot and twelve hundred horſe, and advanced into Laconia.

[1] Plut. & Polyb. ibidem.

Cleomenes, not doubting but the enemy would ſoon viſit him, took care to guard all the paſſes with ſtrong detachments, and to fortify the avenues with ditches and ramparts, filling up and barricadoing the roads with large trees laid acroſs. He marched himſelf with a body of twenty thouſand men, and encamped at a certain place called Selaſia, having reaſon to ſuſpect that the enemy propoſed to paſs that way; nor was he deceived in his conjecture. This paſs was formed by two mountains, the one called Eva, the other Olympus; between theſe runs the river Ouens, along the banks of which there was a narrow way leading to Sparta. Cleomenes, having thrown up a good entrenchment at the foot of theſe mountains, poſted the auxiliaries on the eminence of mount Eva under the command of his brother Euclidas, while he himſelf encamped on mount Olympus with the Spartan troops and the mercenaries. The cavalry he drew up along the banks of the river ſuſtained by a body of mercenary foot. When Antigonus arrived, and viewed the ſituation of the ground with the fortifications and defences that Cleomenes had made, and obſerved with how much judgment he had poſted his troops, he did not think it adviſeable to attack him, but encamped at a ſmall diſtance on the banks of the Gorgulus, which covered part of his army. There he remained ſome days, the better to acquaint himſelf with the ſituation of the different poſts and the diſpoſition of the enemy. He often marched round their camp feigning to attack them, ſometimes in one place, ſometimes in another; but finding every poſt well guarded, and Cleomenes warily warily watching his motions, he gave over all thoughts of forcing the enemies camp, and retired to his own, which was equally ſecured againſt all attempts. Both armies having ſtood thus to their defence ſome days, without being able to gain any advantage over each other, the two generals at laſt agreed on a deciſive battle.

The battle of Selaſia. Year of the flood 2780. Before Chriſt 223.

IT is not eaſy to comprehend what could induce Cleomenes to ſuch a reſolution; he was poſted very advantageouſly; his troops were not ſo numerous as the enemy's by one third; he was ſupplied with all ſorts of proviſion from Sparta, with which city he had a free communication. What then could make him hazard a battle, whereof the event was to decide the fate of Lacedæmon? Polybius indeed ſeems to inſinuate the cauſe of this proceeding; for he tells us [m], that Ptolemy king of Egypt, who had promiſed to aſſiſt him in this war, acquainted him, that he was not in a condition to make good his engagement, exhorting him at the ſame time to come to an accommodation with Antigonus and the Achæans. As he was therefore incapable of bearing the whole charge of the war, and had no proſpect of any ſupplies from foreign ſtates, we may ſuppoſe that the deſperate poſture of his affairs forced him to venture a battle.

BOTH armies being drawn up and the ſignals given, Antigonus detached a body of Illyrians againſt Euclidas, who was poſted on mount Eva; but while they were aſcending the hill ſome light-armed troops of the enemy advancing charged them in flank, while Euclidas, who was poſted on the top of the hill, preſſed them in front, and a body of mercenaries warmly attacked their rear. Philopœmen, who then ſerved in the army as a volunteer, obſerving what danger the Illyrians were in, acquainted the commanders with it; but, they not hearkening to him, as he was but very young and had not yet bore any command in the army, without any orders from the generals, he attacked, with a ſmall body of Megalopolitans his countrymen, the enemies horſe, and obliged them to give ground. This forced the mercenaries, who had fallen on the Illyrians rear, to haſten to the relief of the cavalry; for Cleomenes had poſted them at firſt near the cavalry on purpoſe to ſupport and cover them. By this means the Illyrians being diſengaged, reſolutely marched up the hill againſt Euclidas, who inſtead of moving towards the enemy

[m] Polyb. lib. ii.

my, and thereby improving the advantage of the ſhock which the deſcent of the hill gave him, remained in the place where he was firſt poſted. The Illyrians, having gained the top of the hill without any oppoſition, now advanced againſt Euclidas on even ground, and attacked him with ſuch reſolution, that he was obliged to abandon the top of the hill and retire to the rocks and precipices, where he was ſoon defeated and moſt of his men cut in pieces. This ſucceſs againſt Euclidas was entirely owing to Philopœmen, as Antigonus himſelf acknowledged, for, after the battle, having aſked the officer that engaged the enemies horſe how he came to fall upon them before the ſignal, and the officer excuſing himſelf by ſaying, that a young man of Megalopolis had done it without his direction, the king replied, that the young man had behaved like an experienced commander and gained the victory, but that he had acted like a raw ſoldier [n].

DURING this variety of action the cavalry of both armies had likewiſe engaged on the plain by the river. The Achæans behaved with uncommon bravery, being ſenſible, that this battle would decide their liberties. Philopœmen diſtinguiſhed himſelf above the reſt, for his horſe being killed under him, he afterwards fought among the foot, killing with his own hand great numbers of the enemies, till he was with a javelin ſtruck through both thighs at one ſtroke.

BUT the ſharpeſt encounter was on mount Olympus, where the two kings engaged with their light-armed troops and mercenaries, conſiſting of about five thouſand on each ſide. As they fought under the eye of their princes, every man ſtrove to ſignalize himſelf and perform ſomething worthy of ſuch ſpectators. It was a long time before victory inclined to either ſide; but at laſt Cleomenes, receiving notice that his brother was defeated on the hill, and that his cavalry began to give ground on the plain, being apprehenſive that the enemy would pour in upon him from all quarters, thought it adviſeable to level all the intrenchments before his camp, and order his troops to march out in front. The trumpets therefore having ſounded the ſignal for the light-armed troops to retire, the phalanxes advanced on both ſides with equal animoſity; but the Lacedæmonian phalanx, not being able to ſuſtain the ſhock of the Cleomenes defeated.

[n] Idem, ibid.

the double Macedonian phalanx, gave ground, and ſoon fell into the utmoſt confuſion. The overthrow then became general; the Lacedæmonians were every where cut in pieces, and thoſe who found means to make their eſcape fled from the field of battle in the greateſt diſorder. Cleomenes with a ſmall party of horſe retreated to Sparta, whence he departed the night following to Gythium, where he embarked on a veſſel, that attended him there according to his directions, and ſailed to Alexandria, accompanied by a ſmall number only of his intimate friends[o]. Plutarch aſſures us, that moſt of the foreign troops in both armies were ſlain in this engagement, and that of five thouſand Lacedæmonians two hundred only outlived that action.

CLEOMENES had ſcarce ſet ſail when Antigonus arrived at Sparta, and made himſelf maſter of it without reſiſtance; for Cleomenes had adviſed the citizens to receive Antigonus, aſſuring them at the ſame time, that, whatever might be his own condition, he would always promote the welfare of his country. The conqueror treated the inhabitants in a very friendly manner, declaring to them, that he had not engaged in a war againſt the Spartans, but againſt Cleomenes, whoſe flight had diſarmed his reſentment. He added, that nothing could render his memory ſo glorious in future ages, as to have it ſaid, that Sparta had been preſerved by the prince, who alone had the good fortune to conquer it. Having in this friendly manner addreſſed the citizens, he declared them free and reſtored them to the full enjoyment of their antient privileges. He ſhewed an inclination to continue ſome time among them, but was obliged to leave the city three days after he had entered it. His departure was occaſioned by the intelligence he received that the Illyrians had invaded Macedonia, and were committing there dreadful ravages. If Cleomenes had reſpited giving battle three days only, or had fortified himſelf in Sparta and held out for ſo ſhort a ſpace of time, he would have preſerved his dominions. From Sparta Antigonus marched to Tegæa, which city he likewiſe declared free, and from thence to Argos, where the general aſſembly of the Achæan confederacy was then ſitting. There he was thanked by the deputies of each city of the Achæan league, and by a decree of the council declared the [o] Polyb. ubi ſupra. Plut. in Cleom.

the protector of Achaia. From Argos he proceeded by long journies to Macedon, where he gained a ſignal victory over the Illyrians; but on that occaſion ſtraining his voice to animate his men, he burſt a vein, and having voided a great quantity of blood, he fell into an ill ſtate of health, which ſoon after took him out of the world [p]. Thus ended the Cleomenic war, leaving all Greece in a profound tranquility.

The war of the confederates.

BUT the Ætolians were ſoon weary of peace, which obliged them to live honeſtly and abſtain from plunder and rapine which they uſed to ſubſiſt on, leading much the ſame life on land as pirates do at ſea; they had no ſenſe of friendſhip or alliance, accounting all thoſe as enemies whom they could prey upon, and believing they had a right to any thing they could take away. However, during the life of Antigonus, the fear they were under leſt he ſhould fall upon them kept them in awe. But he was no ſooner dead, and Philip the ſon of Demetrius, who was then very young, placed on the throne, than they returned to their old manner of life, entering the territories of the Meſſenians, and carrying off their cattle and whatever elſe they could meet with. Complaints were made to their chief magiſtrates of ſuch proceedings; but they ſeemed rather inclined to encourage than reſtrain ſuch robberies, being ſharers in the booty. The chief author of all theſe diſorders was one Dorimachus of Trichonia, a turbulent young man, and, as our author calls him [q], every way an Ætolian, who being ſent to Phigalia, a city in Peloponneſus, but of the Ætolian confederacy, to be a ſpie upon the Achæans, encouraged the looſe rable of that place to plunder their neighbours, with a view of enriching himſelf with their ſpoils. To him therefore chiefly the Meſſenians had recourſe, demanding reparation for the damages they had ſuffered, and begging he would not give countenance to the diſturbers of the public tranquillity. Dorimachus told their deputies, that he would come himſelf to Meſſene, and there hear their complaints and ſee all their grievances redreſſed. He went to Meſſene accordingly, but application being made to him by the chief ſufferers, he diſmiſſed them with reproachful language and menaces; nay, while he ſtill remained in the city, a band of Ætolian robbers from Phigalia attacked in the night a certain country-houſe called Chyron, killed all thoſe who made reſiſtance, bound the

[p] Polyb. lib. ii. [q] Polyb. lib. iv.

the reſt, and carried them off together with cattle and furniture. Hereupon the Meſſenians, having cited Dorimachus to appear before their aſſembly, arreſted him on his entering the council, and kept him in priſon, till he promiſed, in the moſt ſolemn manner, that reparation ſhould be made for all the injuries they had ſuffered and the authors of the late ſlaughter put into their hands. But he was no ſooner returned to his own country, than he prevailed upon the Ætolians to revenge the treatment he had met with at Meſſene, by declaring war againſt the Meſſenians; whch being proclaimed, the Ætolian pirates began to infeſt the neighbouring ſeas, taking all the ſhips they met with; they even made prize of a ſhip belonging to the king of Macedon, and carrying her to Cythera ſold there both the ſhip and her company. In ſhort, they plundered all the coaſt of Epirus, made an attempt on Thyrea a city of Acarnania, and, conveying ſome troops privately into Peloponneſus, ſurpriſed and kept poſſeſſion of a ſtrong hold called Clarium in the Megalopolitan territory, making uſe of it to lodge and ſecure their plunder. And now, having a place of retreat in the very heart of Peloponneſus, they began their march towards Meſſene, plundering the cities of Patræ and Pharæ, which were of the Achæan alliance, laying waſte all the countries through which they paſſed, till they came to Phigalia, which they made their place of arms, making from thence frequent inroads on the lands of the Meſſenians [r].

The Achæans in the mean time aſſembling according to the cuſtom at Ægium, the complaints of the Patræans and Pharæans were heard, and the deputies of the Meſſenians ſent to implore the aſſiſtance of the Achæans againſt the common enemy. After the aſſembly had deliberated on theſe matters, it was agreed, that the ſtate had been affronted by this inſolent proceeding of the Ætolians, who had preſumed to enter Achaia in a hoſtile manner, contrary to the treary of peace. Whereupon, juſtly provoked by theſe infractions, they reſolved to ſend ſuccours to the Meſſenians, and that, as ſoon as the prætor ſhould have raiſed them, they would then proceed further to execute what ſhould be thought expedient by the aſſembly. Timoxenus, who was then prætor of the Achæans, was not at all pleaſed with the decree of the aſſembly; for, his authority

[r] Polyb. lib. iv.

thority not being yet expired, he had no mind to head the army, which duty was annexed to his office, as having a very mean opinion of the Achæan ſoldiery. But Aratus, provoked at the indignities they had ſuffered by the audacious Ætolians, loſt no time in putting the Achæans under arms, being determined to come ſpeedily to a battle with the enemy. Five days before he entered on his charge, he diſpatched orders to all the towns and cities, appointing them a day, when all their young men fit for the ſervice ſhould aſſemble at Megalopolis. All the Achæan youth being drawn together purſuant to his orders at the place of rendezvous, he ſent a meſſenger to the Ætolians, requiring them to depart the territories of Meſſenia, and not to march into Achaia on peril of being treated as enemies. The Ætolians, not being at that time in a condition to make head againſt the army of the Achæans, complied with his demand. Whereupon Aratus diſmiſſed the Achæans and Lacedæmonians, who had joined him, marching only with three thouſand foot and three hundred horſe, to obſerve the motions of the enemy and prevent them from plundering the country. As he drew near them he obſerved, that they were marching off with an immenſe booty, which ſo provoked him, that he could not forbear attacking them under all the diſadvantages imaginable. The diſpute was long and obſtinate, but at laſt the Achæans, having the diſadvantage of the ground and being overpowered with numbers, were obliged to retire. The Ætolians purſued them cloſe with great ſhouts and acclamations, and made ſuch a ſlaughter of the fugitives, that they muſt have all been cut off, had they not had at hand the ſafe retreats of Orchomenus and Caphya. The Megalapolitans, who had drawn all their forces together in order to join Aratus, arrived the day after the battle, and proved of no other uſe than to bury thoſe whom they hoped to have relieved. And now the Ætolians, having gained a complete victory, contrary to their expectation, marched without fear or danger quite croſs the Peloponneſus, made an unſucceſsful attempt on Pellene, plundered the territory of Sicyon, and encamped on the iſthmus.

Battle of Caphya loſt by Aratus. Year of the flood 2782. Before Chriſt 221.

In the mean time, the Achæans having called their general aſſembly, complaints were made againſt Aratus by all the allies, as the cauſe of the loſs and diſhonour which they had ſuſtained. And indeed there was no diſpute, but Aratus had greatly erred in having, we may Aratus accuſed before the aſſembly of the Achæans.

ſay,

ſay, uſurped the magiſtracy, by taking it upon him before he was regularly elected into his charge; and he could not deny but what he had undertaken thereupon had ſucceeded very ill. However, he endeavoured to prove, that the loſs of the battle was not his fault; adding, that, if he had been wanting in any of the duties of an able commander, he aſked pardon, and hoped, that in regard of his paſt ſervices they would not cenſure him with more rigour than humanity. His ſubmiſſion on this occaſion changed the minds of the whole aſſembly, and the people began to vent their rage upon his accuſers, who, privately withdrawing, left Aratus in greater eſteem among all ranks of people than he had ever been to that time: the aſſembly gave themſelves entirely up to his counſel and conduct, and re-inſtated him in the command of the allied army. However, the remembrance of his defeat had thrown a great damp on his courage; ſo that he behaved as a prudent civil magiſtrate, rather than as an able warrior; and though the Ætolians often gave him opportunities to diſtreſs them, he made no advantage of them, but ſuffered their parties to lay waſte almoſt the whole country [s] (D).

THE Achæans were therefore forced to addreſs Macedonia again, and call in Philip, in hopes that the affection he bore to Aratus, and the confidence he had in him, would incline that monarch to ſend them ſpeedy ſuccours. For Antigonus on his death-bed had above all things entreated Philip to join with Aratus, and follow his counſel in all things relating to Greece; he had alſo ſent him when very young into Peloponneſus, to learn the art of government under the eye of ſo great a ſtateſman. Philip, having

[s] Polyb. ubi ſupra. Plut. in Arat.

(D) Aratus was accuſed in the aſſembly, firſt, of having taken the command upon him before he was duly elected: ſecondly, he was blamed for having diſmiſſed the Achæan troops, while the Ætolians were ſtill in the heart of Peloponneſus, notwithſtanding he had before been well aſſured, that they did all they could to engage Peloponneſus in a war. The third article againſt him was, his venturing to join battle with ſo few troops, when he might have made with great eaſe a ſafe retreat to the neighbouring towns, and there reinforced his army. The laſt and heavieſt charge againſt him was, that, after he had reſolved to give the enemy battle, he did not make one ſoldier-like ſtep in the whole conduct of the action.

having given audience to the Achæan deputies, and underſtood by their ſpeech the injuries they had ſuffered from the Ætolians, contrary to the articles of peace agreed on in the reign of Antigonus, promiſed to aſſiſt them with the whole ſtrength of his kingdom; and accordingly ſoon after ſet out for Greece, and arrived at Corinth. Upon his arrival the embaſſadors of the confederates, who were already met at Corinth, began to concert with him what meaſures they ſhould take with relation to the Ætolians. Complaints were made to the king by almoſt every city in Peloponneſus againſt them, and war unanimouſly declared both by the king and the confederates. It was moreover enacted by the aſſembly, with the concurrence and approbation of Philip, that all thoſe who had been ſufferers by the Ætolians, ſince the death of Demetrius father to Philip, ſhould be received into the confederacy, and that if any city or ſtate had been awed into an alliance with the Ætolians, and paid them tribute, they ſhould be forthwith ſet at liberty, the ſecurity of their reſpective governments committed to their own hands, and all garriſons withdrawn. This decree was ſent to all the confederate towns, to the end, that, it being every where received and ratified by the ſuffrages of the people, they might jointly in their different ſtates proclaim war againſt the common enemy. Which was done accordingly, and the war from thence called the confederate war [t].

The Ætolians on the other ſide prepared for war, and choſe for their prætor one Scopas, who had been the chief author of all the violences they had committed. Philip, having concerted with the Achæans the operations of the enſuing campaign, marched his army back into Macedon, where he employed all the winter in making the requiſite military preparations. He won over Scerdilaidas to the Achæan league. He was a petty king of Illyria, and had engaged in an alliance with the Ætolians, but was at that time highly incenſed againſt them for refuſing to give him, according to the articles agreed upon between them, ſhare of the ſpoils which had been got at the taking of Cynætha. This breach of articles ſo diſguſted him, that he was eaſily prevailed upon by Philip to enter into the common alliance, and furniſh a fleet of thirty ſhips, on the

[t] Polyb. ibid p. 294. 299.

the terms of being paid yearly the ſum of twenty talents [u]. The Achæans likewiſe ſent to invite all their allies to join them in the confederacy. The Acarnanians without any heſitation declared war againſt the Ætolians, though they were moſt expoſed to the enemy's inſults, as lying neareſt the Ætolian territories, and no-ways in a condition to defend themſelves. Our author beſtows the higheſt encomiums on this people, telling us, that there is no nation among the Greeks with which friendſhip may be more ſafely contracted, there being none that profeſs more regard to public or private faith, or will venture further for the love of liberty: that, both in public and private treaties, they prefer honour to all other conſiderations, and that, however weak, they have often in defence of their reputation engaged in the greateſt dangers [w]. The Epirots refuſed to declare war, till Philip ſhould firſt proclaim it. The Meſſenians, for whoſe ſake the war was undertaken, declared that they would not engage in it, unleſs Phigalia, which commanded their frontiers, were firſt drawn off from the Ætolian league. The Lacedæmonians had declared at firſt for the Achæans, but, the contrary faction prevailing, they joined the Ætolians. Thus all things falling out to the wiſh of the Ætolians, they entered on the war with great hopes of ſucceſs, while the Achæans had but a melancholy proſpect of their affairs. For Philip, on whom chiefly they relied, was yet but forming his army; the Epirots were ſlow in their preparations, and the Meſſenians continued neuter, while the Ætolians, aſſiſted by the Eleans and Lacedæmonians, attacked them on all ſides [x] and gained very conſiderable advantages. Embaſſadors were therefore diſpatched to Philip, who, hearing the danger his allies were in, marched out to their relief with fifteen thouſand foot and eight hundred horſe, and croſſing Theſſaly arrived in Epirus. Here he was prevailed upon by the Epirots to lay ſiege to Ambracia, which took him up forty days, and gave the enemy time to prepare againſt his coming; whereas, if he had led his army directly into Ætolia, he would in all likelihood have at once put an end to the war. While Philip was employed at Am-

[u] Idem, ibid. p. 305, 306. [w] Idem, ibid. p. 330.
[x] Idem, ibid. p. 334.

Ambracia, Scopas, at the head of a numerous body of Ætolians, took his march through Theſſaly, and entering Macedonia ravaged the country without the leaſt oppoſition, returning home in a ſhort time with an immenſe booty. However, this did not hinder Philip from purſuing the ſiege of Ambracia, and, after the ſurrender of that city, entering Ætolia and ſeizing on a great many important places; he would have ſoon reduced all Ætolia, had he not been obliged to repair to the relief of his own country, which the Dardanians were upon the point of invading. At his departure he aſſured the embaſſadors of the Achæans, that as ſoon as he ſhould be able to compoſe his affairs at home, he would return into Greece and aſſiſt them to the utmoſt of his power. His unexpected arrival ſo terrified the Dardanians, that they diſmiſſed their army, after they had got near the frontiers of Macedonia, and retired home. Whereupon Philip returning to Theſſaly ſpent there the remaining part of the ſummer in the city of Lariſſa [y].

In the mean time Dorimachus, whom the Ætolians had juſt before appointed their prætor, drawing together their troops led them into the upper Epirus, laying waſte the whole country, not ſo much in proſpect of profit to himſelf, as out of malice to the Epirots. He did not even ſpare the temple of Dodona, but laid it in aſhes carrying home all the ornaments and rich furniture of that ſtately edifice. Philip having notice of theſe ravages, though it was now the depth of winter, left Lariſſa, and taking with him three thouſand Chalcaſpides, ſo called from their carrying brazen ſhields, two thouſand buckler-men, three hundred Candiots, and about four hundred horſe, marched through Theſſaly and Eubæa to Corinth, where he arrived without any one's having the leaſt notice of his march. On his arrival he ſent for Aratus, and diſpatched letters to his ſon, who bore the ſame name, and was that year prætor and commander in chief of the Achæan forces, requiring him to aſſemble the troops as ſoon as poſſible, and appoint a place of rendezvous. Caphya was the place agreed on; whither while Philip was marching, he met with a detachment of two thouſand Eleans, who, under the command of Euripidas, were advancing to plunder the territory of Sicyon, and having attacked them unexpectedly, for they were quite ignorant of Philip's return, he took about twelve

[y] Polyb. ibid.

twelve hundred of them, and cut the reſt in pieces. Three days after he arrived at Caphya, where he halted two days to refreſh his troops, and then together with Aratus the younger, who had there drawn together ten thouſand Achæans, he advanced to Pſophis, with a deſign to beſiege it. This was a bold attempt, for the city was accounted impregnable, both on account of its natural ſituation, and the many fortifications which had been added to it (E), and beſides was furniſhed with a ſtrong garriſon commanded by Euripidas, who had eſcaped from the late defeat. Philip encamped on an eminence at a ſmall diſtance from the town, and, after viewing the fortifications and ſituation of the place, was a long time doubtful whether he ſhould attempt it or not; but at length, reflecting on the great importance of ſuch a fortreſs, he reſolved at all adventures to begin the ſiege. Having therefore ordered his troops to refreſh themſelves, and be in a readineſs under their arms by break of day, he commanded them to march down and paſs the bridge over the Erymanthus; which they did without oppoſition, the garriſon not ſuſpecting they would venture on ſuch a dangerous enterprize. Having croſſed the river they approached the town, and lodged themſelves at the very foot of the wall. This ſtruck Euripidas and the garriſon with great terror; for they never imagined, that the enemy would be ſo bold as to make an eſſay of their ſtrength againſt a place ſo well fortified and provided, or to undertake a long ſiege, by reaſon of the winter and bad weather. What they chiefly apprehended was, that Philip might become maſter of the place by intelligence. But when theſe fears were over, there being none in the town ſo much as inclined to the king's party, they betook themſelves to the defence of the works, the greateſt part of the Ætolians mounting the walls, while the Elean mercenaries

Pſophis taken by the confederates.

(E) Pſophis was the moſt antient city of Arcadia, ſituated in the very heart of Peloponneſus, and on the weſt borders of Arcadia towards the frontiers of Achaia. It was ſurrounded on the weſt ſide by a rapid ſtream, which during the winter was nowhere fordable; on the eaſt by the Erymanthus, a great and violent river; on the ſouth by a torrent which emptied itſelf into the Erymanthus; on the north it was defended by an eminence very ſtrong by nature and greatly improved by art, which ſerved for a citadel; and beſides, the walls and works about the town were very conſiderable, both for their height and thickneſs.

made a ſally by a gate in the upper part of the town in hopes of ſurpriſing the enemy on that ſide. In the mean time the king, having appointed three ſeveral attacks to be made, ordered ladders to be raiſed by men deſtined for that particular ſervice againſt each place, with a ſtrong guard of Macedonians to ſupport them; then commanding the ſignal to be given, they advanced to the aſſault on all quarters of the town; the garriſon for ſome time made a brave reſiſtance, overturning many of their ladders, but their darts beginning to fail them, and the Macedonians bravely maintaining the attack, notwithſtanding the oppoſition they met with, they deſerted at length their poſts, and betook themſelves to flight to the citadel, leaving the Macedonians poſſeſſed of the walls. At the ſame time the Candiots, who had engaged the party that had made the ſally, beat them back, and in the purſuit entered pell-mell with them into the town; ſo that it was taken in all quarters at once. The inhabitants with their wives aud children took ſanctuary in the citadel, as did Euripidas and ſuch as had time to provide for their ſafety [z]. Euripidas, foreſeeing what muſt inevitably befal him, capitulated with Philip and yielded up the citadel, after having obtained indemnity for all that were retired thither, both towns-men and ſtrangers. The king being obliged by the bad weather to take up his abode here for ſome days, he aſſembled all the Achæans that were with him, and after ſhewing them of what importance the city of Pſophis was to them in the war they had on their hands, generouſly gave it up to their deputies, aſſuring them at the ſame time, that he would let no occaſion paſs of ſhewing them the ſtrongeſt proofs of his affection to their nation and zeal for their intereſt.

FROM Pſophis the king led his army to Laſion, which he found abandoned both by the Elean garriſon and the inhabitants. This town likewiſe he delivered up to the Achæans, as he did the city of Stratus to the Telphuſſians, whom the Eleans had driven out. From Stratus he continued his march to Olympia, where after he had allowed his troops three days reſt, he entered the territories of the Eleans, ſending detachments abroad to plunder and lay waſte the country, while he encamped with the main body of the army in the neighbourhood of Artemiſium. This territory had been formerly accounted ſacred in regard

[z] Polyb. ibid. p. 336.

gard of the Olympic games, which were ſolemnized there every fourth year; and all the nations of Greece had agreed never to turn their arms againſt it. But the Eleans had forfeited this privilege by engaging in the wars of Greece, and adhering to one party againſt another. As the territory of the Eleans was the beſt peopled and the moſt fruitful of all Peloponneſus, and the inhabitants ſo fond of a country life that they could never be prevailed upon to inhabit their towns, the allied army found here ſo great a booty that they could ſcarce carry it off, the ſoldiers being over-loaded with the rich moveables of their country-houſes, beſides the many priſoners and numerous herds of cattle, which greatly embaraſſed them in their march. Philip therefore found it neceſſary to retire out of the Elean territory and re-encamp at Olympia, taking on his march the fortreſs of Thaleme, whither many of the Eleans had conveyed their moſt valuable effects [a].

Diſturbances raiſed by Apelles.

WHILE Philip was thus employing his arms in defence of the Achæan liberties, one of his courtiers formed a project of reducing them to a ſtate of ſlavery. Among the many tutors and governors left by Antigonus to king Philip, who came a child to the crown, Apelles held the chief rank, and had preſerved a powerful influence over the young prince. This miniſter took it into his head to reduce the Achæans to the ſame condition in which the Theſſalians were at that time; that is, to ſubject them to the caprice of the miniſters of Macedon, leaving them only the bare name of liberty, which was the caſe of the Theſſalians. To compaſs this deſign, his firſt eſſay was on the patience of the Achæan ſoldiery, whom the Macedonians by his orders often diſlodged, taking poſſeſſion of their quarters, when they found them better provided than themſelves, and depriving them of their plunder; when they complained of this hard uſage he cauſed them to be put under arreſt, and ſeverely puniſhed by the common executioner, imagining, that by this ſort of uſage he ſhould be able by degrees to bring the Achæans to bear any burden, the king ſhould think fit to lay upon them. But Aratus complaining to the king of this injurious treatment and imparting to him the project of Apelles, that prince aſſured him, that care ſhould be taken for the future to prevent any ſuch injuries. And accordingly he ordered Apelles never to lay any commands on the Achæans without the concurrence of their prætor or chief officer. The Achæans, over-joyed at the favour the king ſhewed them and the orders he had given for their peace and ſecurity, were ever beſtowing the higheſt encomiums on his equity and other exalted qualities. And indeed, if our author is to be credited, he was poſſeſſed of all thoſe virtues which can endear a king to his people; ſuch as a lively genius, an uncommon underſtanding, a happy memory, an agreeable utterance, an unaffected grace in all his actions, and a beautiful aſpect heightened by a majeſtic air, which beſpoke the greatneſs of his mind; but his brighteſt virtues were the ſweetneſs of his temper, his affability, and a great deſire to pleaſe and content all who lived under his government [b]. How he forfeited this great character our author gives him, and from a glorious king became an inhuman tyrant, we refer to a more proper place.

[a] Idem, ibid.

THE king, having thus ſettled matters between the Macedonians and Achæans, decamped from Olympia, and, having cauſed a bridge to be laid over the Alpheus, entered the territory of the Triphalians (F), reduced the city of Aliphera (G), and in a few days brought all that country under ſubjection. The rapidity of his conqueſts ſtruck ſuch terror into all the neighbouring ſtates, that moſt of them voluntarily ſubmitted, and the reſt, after a faint reſiſtance

[b] Polyb. ubi ſupra, p. 338, 339.

(F) This country, which took its name from an Arcadian youth, lies on the ſea-coaſt of Peloponneſus between the Eleans and Meſſenians, on the north-weſt ſkirts of Achaia. Its towns were Sancticum, Lepreum, Hypana, Typanæa, Pyrgus, Æpium, Bolax, Styllagium, and Phryxa. All theſe places the Eleans had lately reduced to their obedience, together with Aliphera, a town of Arcadia, and Megalopolis itſelf, a city at that time of great note (3).

(G) Aliphera was ſeated on the top of a high and ſteep hill, which was defended by a ſtrong fortreſs. In this fortreſs was to be ſeen a brazen ſtatue of Minerva, famous for its ſize and the excellence of the workmanſhip. The inhabitants themſelves, as our author tells us, could give no clear account why it was placed there, nor at whoſe charges. It was the work of Hecabodorus and Soſtratus, and generally eſteemed the moſt beautiful and finiſhed piece they ever performed (4).

(3) Polyb. lib. ii. p. 339. 343. (4) Idem, ibid. p. 343.

ſiſtance, were forced to receive the yoke. Having thus greatly weakened the Ætolian confederacy, he returned loaded with ſpoils and glory to Argos, where he paſſed the remainder of the winter [c].

Apelles endeavours to put Aratus in diſgrace with the king.

Apelles had not yet ſo given over his project as to be without hopes of bringing by degrees the Achæans to a ſervile ſubjection. But he well knew, that both the Aratus's, father and ſon, withſtood his deſign, and that the king held them in great eſteem, eſpecially the father, in whom he repoſed the greateſt confidence. He therefore reſolved to attack them both, and by fraud and addreſs put them, if poſſible, in diſgrace with the king. With this view he ſent for all thoſe who were of the oppoſite faction among the Achæans and enemies to Aratus, and having inſtructed himſelf in their ſeveral intereſts and characters, he employed all his arts to engage them in his friendſhip, acting in their favour with the king, whom he endeavoured to perſuade, that if he continued to treat Aratus with ſo much deference, he could never hope to gain any thing on the Achæans further than was ſtipulated by the articles of confederacy. But if he would be pleaſed to countenance thoſe he ſhould recommend, he might ſoon compaſs whatever he deſired, and diſpoſe of all matters in Peloponneſus at his pleaſure. The new friends enforced theſe reflections and improved on the arguments of Apelles. As the time of electing a new prætor was drawing near, he prevailed with the king to be preſent at the Achæan aſſembly, and to employ all his intereſt in favour of one Eperatus, a declared enemy to Aratus, who was accordingly elected in preference to Timozenus, whom Aratus had ſet up. Thus Philip, notwithſtanding his excellent parts, became the tool of his prime miniſter; what then can be expected from a weak prince that devotes himſelf to the will of a crafty intriguing Apelles? And now Apelles began to think that he had advanced far in his enterprize, having obtained an Achæan prætor of his faction. He therefore renewed his attempts, being determined totally to deſtroy the intereſt of Aratus with the king. An incident which happened at that time armed him with new calumnies. Amphidamus, chief of the Eleans, who had been taken priſoner, perſuaded the king that it would be no difficult matter to procure him the friendſhip of his countrymen, and that he could easily make them covet his alliance. Hereupon the king discharged him without ransom, empowering him to assure the Eleans, that, on condition of their entering into an alliance with him, he would suffer them to live in the entire enjoyment of all their privileges, and exempt them both from garrisons and tribute. But the Eleans would not listen to any conditions how advantageous soever, declaring, that no consideration should be capable of inducing them to abandon their antient allies. This so unreasonable a refusal Apelles ascribed to the ill services done clandestinely by Aratus, telling the king, that he had kept Amphidamus from enforcing, as he had engaged to do, his offers to the inhabitants of Elis, and that, on Amphidamus's departure from Olympia towards Elis, he had conferred with him and made him change his mind, being by him persuaded that it would be no-ways for the interest of Peloponnesus that Philip should acquire any power over the Eleans. The king immediately sent for Aratus, and insisted upon Apelles's charging him to his face with what he had brought against him in private. This Apelles did not scruple to do, and that with such an air of assurance as might have disconcerted innocence itself. He even added, that since the king had discovered his insincerity, by which he had rendered himself so unworthy of his kindness and good offices, the whole matter should be referred to the general assembly of the Achæans, and the king in the mean time return with his army into Macedon. This was what he wanted, not doubting, but he should get him condemned there by the powerful influence of his authority. Aratus beseeched the king not to give credit over-hastily to what he heard, shewing, that it was a piece of justice owing by a king, more than by any other man, to a person accused, to command that a strict enquiry be made into the several articles of impeachment, and till then suspend his judgment. In consequence of this he required, that Apelles should be obliged to produce those who were witnesses to the conference whereof he had been accused, and likewise the person who had given Apelles the information, and that in short nothing ought to be omitted whereby the king might arrive at the certain truth of the matter, before he discovered any thing to the assembly. The king thought Aratus's request very just and reasonable, and engaged his royal word that he should be gratified in it. Not long after Amphidamus, being suspected by the Eleans ans to favour the king's party, was obliged to fly his country and retire to Dymas, whither the king was come to ſettle ſome affairs. Aratus laid hold of this opportunity, and begged the king, that he himſelf would examine Amphidamus, ſince the ſecret was ſaid to have been imparted to him. He complied with his requeſt, and upon a ſtrict examination found that there was not the leaſt grounds for the charge. Accordingly Aratus was pronounced innocent, and reſtored to the king's favour and confidence [d].

[c] Idem, p. 343.

As Philip began to want both money and proviſions for his army, he prevailed upon the Achæan magiſtrates, by means of Aratus, to convene a general aſſembly at Sicyon; where, on the report he made of the ſtate of his exchequer and of the urgent want he was in of money to maintain his forces, it was decreed, that, the inſtant his troops ſhould ſet out on their march, fifty talents ſhould be advanced to the king with ten thouſand meaſures of wheat; and that afterwards, ſo long as he ſhould carry on the war in perſon in Peloponneſus, he ſhould receive fifteen talents a month. This renewed his eſteem for Aratus, to whom he was indebted for ſo large a ſupply, as he himſelf acknowledged, in a private conference which he had both with the father and the ſon after the council was diſmiſſed. On this occaſion he imputed all that had paſſed to the artifices of Apelles, begging them to forget their wrongs, and continue to him their affection in the ſame degree as heretofore, ſince he conſidered them now more than ever [e].

And now the armies beginning to move from their winter quarters, it was reſolved to proſecute the war likewiſe by ſea, in order to divide the enemies forces, and be able to carry their arms with more eaſe whitherſoever they ſhould judge it moſt expedient, for they had to do at once with the Ætolians, Lacedæmonians, and Eleans. Purſuant to this reſolution the king ordered the fleet, both his own and the Achæan ſhips, to rendezvous at the port of Lechæum, where he commanded the Macedonian phalanx to be inſtructed in the uſe of the oar.

While Philip was thus employed in training up his Macedonians for naval expeditions, Apelles, who could not brook the diminution of his credit with the king, nor ſuffer that the counſels of Aratus ſhould be followed and not his, took ſecret meaſures to defeat all the king's deſigns. He agreed with Leontius and Megaleas, two chief chief officers who were to act in the army, that they should secretly thwart and obstruct all his measures, while he, making his abode at Chalchis, should take care to shorten and retard his supplies, so that he should be obliged for want of money and provisions, to pass the whole summer in a state of inactivity. His view was to make himself necessary to his sovereign, and to force him by the ill posture of his affairs to throw himself into his arms. With this prospect he acted his own part so well, that, by stopping the convoys of money and provisions that were sending to the king, he reduced him to such straights, that he was obliged to pawn all his plate to supply his wants.

Treaſonable practices of Apelles.

[d] Idem, ibid. p. 344. 349. [e] Idem, l. v. p. 350.

PHILIP, thinking his Macedonians now sufficiently instructed in the use of the oar, embarked with six thousand of them and twelve hundred mercenaries, steering his course towards Patræ, where he arrived the next day. From Patræ he dispatched messengers to the Epirots, Messenians, Acarnanians, and Scardilaidas, requiring them to hasten with their ships and join him at Cephalenia. He then left Patræ, and came to Paleis a strong city in the island of Cephalenia.

Paleis besieged.

Here, finding plenty of corn on the ground to maintain his army, he disembarqued and set down before the place, drawing his vessels ashore and securing them with a good ditch and palliſadoe. He had appointed the confederates to meet him at this place, and was mighty desirous to become master of it before their arrival. It was of great use to the Ætolians, who from thence made all their descents into Peloponnesus and plundered the coasts of Epirus and Acarnania. Philip therefore, having viewed the situation of the town, caused the military engines to be planted before it, ordering his Macedonians to undermine the walls. They went chearfully to work, and in a very short time undermined great part of the wall, propping and supporting it with great wooden stakes. The king then summoned the town to surrender, which the garrison refusing to do, fire was set to the posts that sustained the walls, and a breach made six hundred fathoms wide. Leontius was ordered to mount the breach, and enter the town over the ruins of the wall.

Treachery of Leontius.

But he, mindful of his agreement with Apelles, having corrupted some of the chief officers that served under him, attacked the enemy so faintly, that he was repulsed with great loss, when he had the fairest opportunity that could be wished for of taking the town. This obliged the king to raise the siege, though he was joined by the Epirots, Acarnanians, nanians, Meſſenians, and by fifteen veſſels ſent him by Scardilaidas [f].

While Philip was thus employed at the ſiege of Paleis, Lycurgus the Lacedæmonian marched at the head of a numerous army to the territories of Meſſenia, and Dorimachus the Ætolian with a ſtrong detachment into Theſſaly, both with the ſame deſign of obliging the king by this double diverſion to break up the ſiege. Whereupon embaſſadors were diſpatched to him from the Acarnanians and Meſſenians, the former adviſing him to make an inroad into Ætolia, and thereby oblige Dorimachus to return to the defence of his own country; and the latter entreating him to ſail directly to Meſſenia, where he might eaſily ſurprize Lycurgus, who was not under any apprehenſion of being attacked. Leontius ſtrongly ſeconded this advice, foreſeeing, that if the king followed it he would be obliged to ſpend the whole ſummer there, while the Ætolians would be at liberty to put all to fire and ſword in Theſſaly and Epirus; for during the ſeaſon of the Eteſian winds, which continued moſt part of the ſummer, it was impoſſible to return back, as they were not in thoſe days very expert mariners. Aratus therefore did not fail to declare in favour of the former opinion, ſhewing how advantageous it would be to fall on the Ætolians, while their country was unfurniſhed with troops, and adding, that the opportunity of making deſcents was not to be neglected, now that Dorimachus with the Ætolian troops was employed elſewhere. The king, who, ever ſince the cowardly behaviour of Leontius at Paleis, began to ſuſpect his fidelity, followed the advice of Aratus, and having wrote to Eperatus the Achæan prætor to aſſemble his troops and march to the relief of the Meſſenians, he himſelf weighed anchor, and arrived the next day at Leucas. There he landed his forces, and having cauſed his veſſels to be carried over the iſthmus of Dioryctus, he paſſed into the gulph of Ambracia, which runs far up into Ætolia, and came before day-break to Lemnæa. Here he commanded the ſoldiers to take a ſhort refreſhment, and to be in a readineſs to march without any baggage but what was abſolutely neceſſary. While the king was on the point of ſetting out from Lemnæa, Ariſtophontes the Acarnanian general came to join him with all his forces; for that people, having been great ſufferers by the Ætolians, greedily embraced ſo fair an opportunity of repaying them in their own coin; and on this

[f] Idem, ibid p. 350. 365.

this occaſion not only ſuch as were obliged by their laws to bear arms, but even thoſe who were exempted in regard of their age or long ſervices, took the field. The Epirots incited by the like motives were not leſs forward, though; by reaſon of the extent of their country and the ſudden arrival of king Philip, they had not been able to draw all their forces together. The king, being thus reinforced, departed from Lemnæa in the cloſe of the evening, leaving the baggage under a ſtrong guard, and arrived by day-break at the river Achelous, intending to ſurprize the important town of Thermæ. Leontius, foreſeeing that this enterprize would be attended in all likelihood with ſucceſs, adviſed the king to encamp on the banks of the Achelous, and allow the army ſome reſt after ſo fatigueing a night's march, being willing that the Ætolians ſhould have ſome time to bethink themthemſelves and provide for their defence. But Aratus, being now ſenſible that Leontius oppoſed all promiſing deſigns, preſſed Philip by no means to conſent to any delay, nor upon any reaſon whatſoever reſpite his march, the ſucceſs whereof lay in diſpatch. The king followed his Advice, and ſetting out that inſtant marched directly to Thermæ, through a very rugged and almoſt impracticable road, cut between two ſteep rocks and exceeding narrow. Thermæ was the capital of Ætolia, and the place where their yearly aſſemblies and fairs were held. As it was reckoned impregnable by reaſon of its ſituation, and no enemy had ever before dared to approach it, the Ætolians had lodged in it all their moſt valuable effects. So great therefore was their ſurprize when they ſaw Philip all on a ſudden appear before it, that they had not ſo much preſence of mind as to ſhut the gates or make the leaſt reſiſtance. The Macedonians and allies were permitted to plunder the town, which abounded with all ſorts of proviſions, military ſtores, and valuable moveables. The army remained that night in the town, and the next morning every one chuſing out of the booty what was moſt valuable and eaſy to be carried away, they made a heap of the reſt and burnt it before the camp. They likewiſe ſaved the beſt arms which were found in their armories, exchanging them with ſuch of their own as were leſs ſerviceable, and burning the reſt to the number of fifteen thouſand ſuits [g].

Thermæ, the capital of Ætolia, ſurpriſed and plundered.

THE Macedonians did not ſtop here; but calling to mind what the Ætolians had done at Dium and Dodona, they they ſet fire to the porticos of the temple, and levelled that magnificent ſtructure with the ground, throwing down, defacing, and breaking in pieces to the number of two thouſand ſtatues of exquiſite workmanſhip, and at that time greatly eſteemed even in Greece. They reſpected, however, ſuch as were known, either by their form or the inſcription, to repreſent any of the gods. The deſolation was ſuch as to ſtrike the king himſelf and thoſe about him with a kind of terror, though at the ſame time they believed, that they had not over-acted their revenge for the ſacrilegious impieties of the Ætolians at Dium.

[g] Idem, ibid. p. 365. & ſeq.

Philip having plundered the town marched back the ſame way he came; the booty he placed in the van, guarded by his heavy-armed troops; the Acarnanians and mercenaries were poſted in the rear, and the king himſelf with a body of light-armed Macedonians ready to face the enemy in what part ſoever they ſhould appear; for he was extremely ſolicitous to paſs the ſtreights before the Ætolians could draw together a body of troops to oppoſe his paſſage. But he had ſcarce begun his march when three thouſand Ætolians, headed by Alexander the Trichonian, fell on his rear and put them in great confuſion. This Philip had foreſeen, and accordingly placed a detachment of Illyrians in ambuſh behind a riſing ground. Theſe, unexpectedly appearing, fell on the enemy who had charged beyond them, and having killed about a hundred of them, and taken as many priſoners, obliged the reſt to ſave themſelves by flight among the rocks and woods. He was again attacked near Stratus, but having repulſed the enemy with great courage and reſolution, he arrived ſafe and unmoleſted at Lemnæa, where he had left his baggage and veſſels. Here he ſacrificed to the gods by way of thankſgiving for the ſucceſs that had attended his arms in that expedition, and at the ſame time to expreſs his joy gave his officers a royal entertainment. Leontius and Megaleas were preſent, but every one ſoon perceived by their behaviour, that they looked with an evil eye on the good fortune of their maſter. During the whole entertainment they could not help throwing out againſt Aratus the moſt injurious and ſhocking railleries. But words were not all; at the breaking up of the banquet, being heated with wine and fired with anger, they purſued him with ſtones till he got into his tent. This put the whole army in an uproar, not only the Achæans, but the Macedonians themſelves, running from all quarters to his aſſiſtance. The noiſe ſoon reached the king's ears, who, after a ſtrict enquiry into the whole affair, condemned Megaleas, for Leontius abſconded, in a fine of twenty talents and put him under arreſt. The next day he ſent for Aratus, and after expreſſing his ſenſe of the violence that had been offered him, he gave him new aſſurances of his protection. Leontius, in the mean time, being informed how the king had proceeded with Megaleas, came boldly with a crowd of ſoldiers to the royal tent, thinking thereby, as the prince was but young, to put him into ſome apprehenſion, and awe him into another reſolution touching the offenders. Being come into the king's preſence, Who has been ſo bold, ſays he, as to lay hands on Megaleas? It was I, replied the king in a majeſtic tone, and whatever has been done is by my expreſs command. This reſolution in the king ſo frightened Leontius, that he immediately retired from his preſence. He no ſooner withdrew, but the king called a council to examine into the affair, and hear what was alledged againſt Leontius, Megaleas, and their accomplices. Aratus charged them with all thoſe criminal practices we have already taken notice of, and diſcovered the whole conſpiracy of Apelles. As he urged nothing againſt them but what was vouched by competent witneſſes, they were all found guilty. The king, however, by an unſeaſonable clemency, pardoned them, and even ſet Megaleas at liberty, Leontius binding himſelf for the payment of the fine the king had laid on him [h].

after

During Philip's expedition into Ætolia, Lycurgus king of Sparta made an inroad into the territories of the Meſſenians, but did nothing worth recording. Dorimachus likewiſe, who had led a conſiderable body of Ætolians into Theſſaly, with a deſign to lay waſte the country and thereby oblige the king to raiſe the ſiege of Paleis, returned without compaſſing either, having found the Theſſalians ready to give him a warm reception. He therefore kept on the mountains, till he heard that the Macedonians had invaded Ætolia, when he left Theſſaly and haſtened to the relief of his own country. But before he arrived the king was retired [i].

The confederates enter the country of the Lacedæmonians.

In the mean time Philip, having embarqued his troops at Leucas and plundered the coaſt of Hyanthes in his way, arrived at Corinth, where landing his forces and ordering the veſſels to be carried over to Lechæum, he diſpatched meſſengers meſſengers to the confederate towns of Peloponneſus, appointing them to rendezvous their troops at Tegæa. He then marched from Corinth, and came the next day to Tegæa, whence he proceeded with ſuch of the Achæan horſe as were there ready, holding his rout over the mountains, with a deſign to fall by ſurprize on the Lacedæmonian territories. After four days march through a deſert country, he gained the top of thoſe hills that command the city of Sparta, and thence advanced to Amylcæ, a town diſtant from Sparta about four miles. The Spartans, who had heard of the ſucceſs he met with at Thermæ, were ſtrangely alarmed, when they ſaw the young monarch appear ſo ſuddenly in their territories, and approaching to the very gates of their metropolis. Several ſkirmiſhes were fought, in which Philip was always victorious; but we ſhall omit the particulars, which would ſwell the hiſtory to an undue length, and only ſay, that this expedition proved no leſs glorious to the king's arms than that of Ætolia; for he laid waſte the enemy's country far and near, took and deſtroyed ſeveral towns, beat Lycurgus, who with a body of two thouſand Lacedæmonians had attempted to cut off his retreat, and returned with an immenſe booty to Corinth. Here he found embaſſadors from Rhodes and Chios, who came to offer their mediation and incline both parties to a peace. The king, diſſembling his real intention, told them, that he was willing to conclude a peace with the Ætolians on reaſonable terms, and charged them on their return to diſpoſe his enemies to it. The king at that time had formed a project of making a deſcent on the territories of the Phocians, and executing there an enterprize of great importance. Having therefore diſmiſſed the embaſſadors, he haſtened to Leontium, propoſing to embarque his troops there.

[h] Polyb. ubi ſupra. p. 368. 376. Plut. in Arat. p. 1049.
[i] Idem, p. 372.

Leontius, Megaleas, and Ptolemy raiſe a tumult among the troops.

BUT he was ſcarce gone, when Leontius, Megaleas, and Ptolemy, who was alſo one of Philip's chief officers, began to employ the authority they had over the forces that remained at Corinth, to draw off their affections from their prince, and win them over to their own intereſt. They repreſented to them, chiefly to the light-armed troops and the king's guards, that they, who were the firſt in all hazards and ſecured the reſt of the army from all danger, were not treated according to their merit, and that, inſtead of being diſtinguiſhed by any particular reward for their ſervice, they had been even deprived of the booty which they had taken, notwithſtanding the conſtant cuſtom in like caſes to the contrary. The ſoldiers, eſpecially the youth, were ſo inflamed by theſe ſeditious diſcourſes, that aſſembling in parties they plundered the houſes of the king's chief favourites, and carried their inſolence to that height as to force the gates of the king's own palace. The king, receiving timely notice of the tumult, flew to Corinth, and aſſembling the Macedonians made them ſenſible of their fault, in a long harangue intermixed with gentleneſs and ſeverity. The tumult being appeaſed, ſome adviſed the king to ſeize on the authors of the ſedition and puniſh them with the utmoſt ſeverity; others thought it more adviſeable to gain them by gentle methods, the king being ſtill young, and his authority not yet entirely fixed in the minds of the people. This advice he followed for the preſent, ſtifling his reſentment and pretending to be very well ſatisfied, he returned to Lechæum after exhorting his troops to union and concord. But it was now too late to undertake any thing againſt the Phocians, who had drawn together their forces and were prepared to receive him.

to

In the mean time, Leontius being well appriſed, that the king, though he carried it very fair with him as to outward appearance, would not fail in due time to vent his juſt reſentment upon him, had recourſe to Apelles, giving him notice of the danger he was in, and preſſing him to leave Chalcis and haſten to court. Philip had been informed by Aratus of the whole conduct of Apelles, but had kept his thoughts ſo cloſe, that no body could diſcover from his behaviour any change in him with reſpect to his prime miniſter, who continued to govern at Chalcis more like a ſovereign prince than a ſubject (H). He therefore no ſooner heard of the danger his client was in, but he left Chalcis, not doubting but he ſhould be received at court after the uſual manner, and change the king's mind at his pleaſure. As he

(H) Apelles during his reſidence at Chalcis governed all things with an arbitrary ſway, as if he, and not Phillip, had been inveſted with the ſovereign power. Wherefore the magiſtrates, and ſuch as had charge of the affairs in Macedon and Theſſaly, applied to him alone, and took his directions in all matters of importance. When any of the Greek towns had occaſion to publiſh new laws or ordinances, or confer honours or preferments, there was ſcarce ever any mention made of the king, but of Apelles (5).

(5) Idem, l. v. p. 350. & ſeq.

he drew near to Corinth, Leontius, Megaleas, and Ptolemy, who were the chief officers in the army, prevailed by their authority on the flower of the king's forces to meet him, and attend him by way of guard into the town; ſo that he made his entry with a pompous train, and went directly to wait on the king. But the officer, who was on duty at the gate of the royal palace and had received orders to that effect, ſtopped him, and told him that he muſt wait, for the king was not then at leiſure. Apelles was thunder-ſtruck at ſo unexpected a reception, and after having waited ſome time in ſilence retired to his lodgings, attended only by his own domeſtics, all the reſt having already deſerted him (I). Megaleas, ſeeing the prime miniſter, on whoſe protection he relied, fallen into diſgrace, made his eſcape to Athens, leaving Leontius, who was his ſurety for the ſum of twenty talents, to ſhift for himſelf. Hereupon the king having ſent the buckler-men, whoſe chief officer was Leontius, to Triphalia under the command of Taurion, pretending to have ſome extraordinary occaſion for their ſervice, cauſed Leontius to be arreſted, giving out that it was for the payment of the twenty talents which he was bound for, but in reality to have him in his power, and to ſound the diſpoſition of the ſoldiery. The troops which he commanded no ſooner received notice of his arreſt, but they ſent a petition to the king, importing, that if the commitment of Leontius was on any other account than that of his being ſurety for Megaleas, the king would be pleaſed not to determine any thing againſt him during their abſence; and that they ſhould interpret any ſentence in his prejudice as an injury done to them and reſent it accordingly; but in caſe Leontius was under arreſt to ſecure the payment of the money due on account of Megaleas, they would readily contribute towards ſatisfying the debt. But their affection ſhewn to Leontius proved unſeaſonable, and was taken by the Apelles how received by Philip.

Leontius arreſted.

(I) Behold the uncertain ſtate of mortal greatneſs, ſays our author; in one and the ſame moment men are raiſed to the higheſt preferments and ſunk to the loweſt ebb of fortune; and this chiefly in the courts of princes, where like counters, their value riſes and falls according to they place they are ſet in; for thoſe who follow the court are great and little at the pleaſure of their maſter, who carries their fortune in his hands (6).

(6) Idem, ibid. p. 351.

the king so ill, that it became the occasion of his death sooner than was expected [k].

A thirty days truce granted to the Ætolians.

During this interval, the embassadors returned from Ætolia, bringing with them proposals for a truce of thirty days; they assured the king, that the Ætolians were inclined to peace, and that they had appointed a day for their general assembly to meet at Rhium, where they prayed the king to be present, promising all the advances possible on their part towards a general pacification. Philip accepted of the truce, and sent his dispatches to the confederates, requiring them to send their respective deputies to Patræ, to negotiate a peace with the Ætolians. He himself immediately set out from Lechæum in order to assist at it, and arrived the next day at Patræ. There letters were delivered to him directed by Megaleas to the Ætolians, encouraging them to pursue the war against Philip and the Achæans, since the king was in the utmost distress for want of money and provisions. They contained likewise most reproachful and injurous reflections on the king, which shewed his hatred to him, and convinced him, that the whole faction of Apelles sought his destruction. He therefore ordered him immediately to be taken into custody, together with his son and a youth his favourite, and so sent to Corinth. At the same time he enjoined the magistrates of Thebes to prosecute Megaleas, who had retired thither from Athens; but he prevented his trial by laying violent hands on himself.

Megaleas lays violent hands on himself. Leontius and Apelles put to death.

Not long after Leontius received sentence of death, and likewise Apelles with his son and favourite. History can scarce furnish us with a more remarkable example of the ascendant which a favourite may gain over the mind of his sovereign, in order to satiate with impunity his avarice and ambition. It was with the utmost difficulty, that Aratus roused the king from his irresolution and servitude, and prevailed upon him at last to exert himself, after he had been so long deaf to the repeated complaints of his subjects, and blind to all the faults of his favourite minister [l].

As to the Ætolians, they were sincerely disposed to peace, being grown weary of a war, in which all their projects had succeeded quite otherwise than they expected. They had flattered themselves, that they had to do with a young unexperienced prince, Philip not being yet arrived, as they imagined, at an age of conduct and experience; but they found found him an able and enterprizing leader, and well qualified both for counſel and execution. However, when they came to hear of the mutiny of the troops and the conſpiracy of Apelles, hoping theſe troubles would beget diſtractions at court, they poſtponed their meeting at Rhium. Philip and the confederates, who had a hopeful proſpect of the iſſue of the war, and wiſhed for nothing more ardently than to break off all negotiations of peace, were glad of the opportunity which the enemy furniſhed them with, and accordingly animated each other to the proſecution of the war. As winter was drawing near, Philip, after engaging the allies to meet him with their forces early in the ſpring, weighed anchor and returned to Corinth. There he gave the Macedonians leave to return to their winter quarters in their own country; while he coaſting Attica went to Demetrias in Theſſaly, where Ptolemy, the only conſpirator that remained, was ſentenced to die and executed accordingly.

[k] Idem, p. 373, 374.

[l] Idem, ibid. p. 376.

The confederates reſolve to purſue the war.

By this time Eperatus, who had been choſen prætor of the Achæans by the influence of Apelles, as we have related above, was become univerſally deſpiſed, as being no ways qualified for that truſt, which is commonly the caſe in forced elections. No one would pay obedience to his orders, and the country being open and defenceleſs, great havock was made in it by Pyrrhias, at the head of three thouſand Eleans and Ætolians. The Achæan troops, being in arrear of their pay, refuſed to obey the prætor's orders, when at any time they were commanded to march out to the relief of the country, and deſerted in great numbers. All this was owing to the inſufficiency of Eperatus; but, happily for the Achæans, his authority was almoſt expired, and early in the ſummer Aratus appointed to ſucceed him [m]. The new prætor found the Achæan mercenaries corrupted by an univerſal decay of military diſcipline, and the cities no ways diſpoſed to contribute towards the carrying on of the war. In the general aſſembly, after having warmly exhorted their deputies to the proſecution of the war, he wreſted from them a decree, empowering him to levy eight thouſand mercenary foot and five hundred horſe, beſides three thouſand foot and three hundred horſe which were to be raiſed at home. By the ſame decree the Megalopolitans were to contribute three hundred foot and fifty horſe, and the Argians the like number [n].

[m] Idem, p. 377. [n] Idem, p. 378.

WHILE the Achæans were thus preparing for the proſecution of the war, Lycurgus and Pyrrhias, prætor of the Eleans, taking the field, made an inroad into the territories of the Meſſenians, but were ſoon forced to retire by Aratus, who advanced with the mercenaries to cover the frontiers of Meſſene, Megalopolis, Tegæa, and Argos, which were moſt expoſed to the inſults of the Lacedæmonians. Not long after Lycus, whom Aratus had appointed to command the troops while he aſſiſted at the general aſſembly, gained a conſiderable victory over the Eleans, who, under the conduct of Euripidas their new prætor, had advanced as far as Pharæa, plundering and laying waſte the whole country. The plunder which he got on this occaſion produced a great ſum of money; ſo that the troops took better heart in proſpect of better pay, and the people conceived hopes that they ſhould now be exempt from taxes and contributions towards the war.

Thebes of Phthiotis taken by the confederates. Year of the flood 2786. before Chriſt 217.

IN the mean time, Philip, having ordered ſuch ſtores and proviſions as he had provided during the winter to be brought from Lariſſa, ſet out on his march towards Greece, with a deſign to begin the campaign with the ſiege of Thebes called Phthiotis (L), whence the Ætolians uſed to make continual inroads into the territories of Demetrias, Pharſalia, and even Lariſſa. Accordingly, having divided his army into three bodies, he inveſted the town, and, with an hundred and fifty catapults and other engines for caſting of ſtones, began to batter the walls night and day without intermiſſion. The inhabitants at firſt made a vigorous reſiſtance; but great numbers of them being killed by the many darts and ſtones that had been caſt into the town, and the reſt quite tired out by inceſſant attacks which kept them continually in action, their reſolution began to fail, and the Macedonians advancing their mines, and now preparing to give the aſſault, they thought fit to ſurrender at diſcretion. Philip plundered the town, ſold the inhabitants, and, repeopling it with a colony of Macedonians, changed the name of Thebes into that of Philippopolis.

NOT long after the town had ſurrendered, new embaſſadors came to him from Chios, Rhodes, Byzantium, and from from Ptolemy king of Egypt, to propoſe the concluding of a peace. The king replied as he had done before, that he was inclined to put an end to the war, and that they needed but apply to the Ætolians, to know whether they were willing to concur with him in reſtoring Greece to its former tranquillity. Philip was in reality very far from being inclined to a peace; but, as he did not care to declare his true intentions, he only told the embaſſadors, that in the mean time he was determined to purſue his enterprizes.

(L) This city was ſituate near the ſea about eight and thirty miles diſtance from Lariſſa; and was on the frontiers of Magneſia and Theſſaly, its territory bordering on Magneſia towards Demetrias, and on Theſſaly towards that tract which was inhabited by the Pharſalians and Pheræans.

He afterwards ſet out with his friends and favourites for Argos, to be preſent at the Nemæan games. While he was one day aſſiſting at one of theſe public ſports, he was interrupted by an expreſs ſent him from Macedon, with advice, that the Romans had loſt a great battle in Tuſcany near the lake Thraſymenus, and that Hannibal was maſter of all the open country. This news Philip imparted to none but Demetrius of Pharus, enjoining him all poſſible ſecreſy. Demetrius glad of this opportunity, adviſed him to put a period to the Ætolian war with what expedition he could, in order to invade Illyricum (M), and afterwards croſs over into Italy. He added, that ſuch a deſign would gain him the affections of the whole Greek nation, that the Achæans would join him out of the affection they bore him, and the Ætolians through fear, after the calamities they had ſuffered in the preſent war; that ſuch an expedition would be his firſt ſtep to univerſal monarchy, which none had a better claim to than himſelf; and that the preſent diſtreſs of the Romans offered him a favourable opportunity of executing ſo mighty a project. Such council as this could not but charm a king, who was in the flower of his youth, ſucceſsful in his exploits, bold, enterpriſing, and of a race which had always graſped at univerſal empire.

(M) Scerdilaidas, a petty king of Illyria, whom we have mentioned above, thinking himſelf ill treated by Philip, who had not yet paid him the money that was due to him, according to the treaty agreed on by both parties, fitted out a ſquadron with orders to take by repriſal what was due by agreement. This ſquadron being admitted into the port of Leucas, for Scerdilaidas was in alliance with the Achæans, ſeized there ſome Macedonian veſſels, and ſent them together with the Macedonians that were aboard into Illyricum. From thence they ſailed to Malea, taking all the king's veſſels they could meet with. A war with this prince Demetrius thought would prove very favourable to his preſent project.

Philip inclined to conclude a peace.

HOWEVER, as no man could better conceal his real intentions a very rare quality in ſo young a prince, he did not ſhew that ſtrong inclination for peace which he had in reality conceived. He only diſpatched letters to the confederates, exhorting them to ſend their deputies to the aſſembly to negotiate a peace; and in the mean time, the better to hide his inclinations, he advanced with his forces to Loſion, and, after taking a ſmall fortreſs which was built on the ruins of that place, he made as if he intended to poſſeſs himſelf of Elea. Both parties were grown ſo tired of the war, that his ſummons was received every where with great joy, and plenipotentiaries from all parts haſtened to Naupactus which was the place appointed for the conferences. The king, to give a more expeditious iſſue to the affair, came at the head of his army, and encamping within leſs than a league of the place attended there the reſult of their conferences. The firſt article which the king cauſed to be propoſed to the Ætolians, by the embaſſadors of the confederate cities, was, that every one ſhould continue in poſſeſſion of his conqueſts; which article being agreed upon, the reſt met with no difficulty, ſo that the treaty was ſoon concluded and ratified by Philip and the Achæans on one ſide, and the Ætolians, Lacedæmonians, and Eleans on the other [o].

The ſpeech of Agelas of Naupactus, at the opening of the aſſembly.

AT the firſt opening of the aſſembly, Agelas of Naupactus made a ſpeech before the king and the confederates, which deſerves a place here, ſince Polybius has thought it worthy of relating at length in his hiſtory. He told them, that the Greeks ought above all things to ſhun all occaſions of war among themſelves, and render thanks to the gods, that, becoming now of one mind, and leading each other, as it were, by the hand, like thoſe who ford a river, they had a proſpect of uniting in a mutual defence of themſelves and their cities againſt the barbarians, whoſe deſigns they had ſo much cauſe to apprehend. That, though they could not give perpetuity to the preſent union, it behoved them, at leaſt in that juncture, to agree as one man in the preſervation of their liberties, ſince none could be ignorant of the great power of the barbarians, and the mighty war they were like to have on their hands with that people. That it was evident to every one who was ever ſo little ſkilled in politics, that the conquerors, whether Carthaginians or Romans

[o] Polyb. ibid. p. 435.

Romans, would not confine themſelves to the empire of Italy or Sicily, but extend their conqueſt further, even to Greece itſelf. Wherefore he exhorted them, eſpecially Philip, to keep a watchful eye on the danger that threatened them; ſaying, that this prince would be able to avert it, if inſtead of impairing the ſtrength of the Greeks, as he had hitherto done, and rendering them by that means an eaſier prey to their enemies, he would now take their affairs to heart, and act for the whole Greek nation as if Greece were his inheritance. That by this means he would win the affection of the Greeks, who would be inviolably attached to him and concur in all his meaſures. That, if his mind was bent on great enterprizes and he thirſted after glory, he ſhould extend his proſpect towards the weſt, and keep an eye on the war which had ſet all Italy in a flame; that he ſhould watch the event of it, improve it to his advantage, and generouſly aſpire to the dominion of the world. That if he had any diſputes with the Greeks, he ſhould leave the deciſion of them to another ſeaſon; for if he once ſuffered the ſtorm, that was gathering in the weſt, to reach Greece, it might juſtly be feared, that it would then no longer be in their power to make war, conclude a peace, or manage their affairs as they pleaſed.

THIS ſpeech, which was a clear prediction of what happened afterwards to Greece, inſpired both the confederates and Philip with an eager deſire of peace. And this is the firſt time that the affairs of Italy influenced thoſe of Greece. For after this neither Philip nor the other powers of Greece regulated their conduct from the ſtate of their reſpective neighbours, but kept their eyes fixed on Italy, as the only object of their attention. The Aſiatics and the inhabitants of the iſlands did the ſame ſoon after, having no more recourſe in their diſputes to Antiochus or Ptolemy, to ſouthern or eaſtern princes, but turning their eyes weſtward, and ſending embaſſadors, ſome to the Carthaginians, others to the Romans. In like manner the Romans, awakened by the growing power and enterpriſing genius of Philip, diſpatched embaſſadors into Greece, to obviate betimes the dangers that threatened them from that quarter, as will be ſeen in the ſequel of this hiſtory [P].

A peace concluded.

As ſoon as the peace was ratified, the Achæans raiſed Timoxenus to the prætorſhip, and then returned to their antient manner and cuſtom of life, after having re-edified the walls of their cities, rebuilt their temples and altars, eſtabliſhed their worſhip, and repaired the public and private damages, which they had ſuſtained during the war.

[P] Idem, ibid. p. 436, 437.

Philip changes his conduct.

But this happy ſtate of tranquility was ſoon diſturbed by that very prince who had procured it. Philip, having concluded an alliance with Hannibal, began to change his conduct, and thinking it neceſſary to bring all Greece to an abſolute ſubjection, before he made any attempts upon Italy, he began with the Meſſenians, who had been lately admitted into the Achæan confederacy. The city of Meſſene was at this time rent into two factions, the nobility ſtriving to humble the people, and the people to leſſen the power of the nobility. Theſe contentions became ſo violent, that both factions agreed to call in Philip and refer their differences to his arbitration. The ambitious prince was glad of this opportunity, and flew to Meſſene, with a deſign to make himſelf maſter of the city. On his arrival he found Aratus employing his beſt endeavours to compoſe their differences, in a manner that no ways ſuited his private ends. He therefore did not think fit to adviſe with him, but held private conferences with ſuch of the Meſſenians as reſorted to his palace. The nobility he encouraged to curb the inſolence of the unruly rabble with the utmoſt ſeverity of the laws; but uſed a quite different ſtile in talking with the heads of the popular faction, telling them, that they were to blame for ſuffering themſelves, being ſo many, to be oppreſſed by a few, as if they had no hands to defend themſelves againſt tyrants. Thus both parties preſuming on the king's aſſiſtance, thought it adviſeable to exert themſelves before he was gone, ſince he ſeemed ſo well diſpoſed to countenance them. Accordingly the nobility gave orders for the apprehending of ſome orators, who ſtirred up, ſaid they, the people to ſedition; this alarmed the populace, who falling upon the nobility murdered in their rage above two hundred of them. This is what Philip had propoſed from the very beginning, being well apprized, that if one party were deſtroyed, it would be no hard taſk for him to get the better of the other. Neither did Aratus the younger forbear reproaching him with it, in very bitter and offenſive terms. But the king, who on ſuch occaſions had a marvellous command of his temper, ſmothered his reſentment, and taking Aratus the elder by the hand, he aſked him, whether he would not attend him up to the caſtle of Ithome where he intended to ſacrifice. This caſtle commanded the city of Meſſene, Diſturbances at Meſſene.

and

and kept the further parts of Peloponneſus in awe, as Acro-Corinth, which he was already poſſeſſed of, did the hither. Ithome was held by ſome of the popular faction, who, looking upon Philip as their deliverer, admitted him without the leaſt jealouſy. While the ſacrifice was performing, the entrails of the victim being, aecording to cuſtom, put into his hands, he ſhewed them to Aratus, and with a ſmile aſked him, whether they prognoſticated, that, being now in poſſeſſion of ſo important a place, he ſhould tamely part with it, or rather keep it for his own uſe. Aratus made no reply, but Demetrius Pharius, though the king had not aſked his advice, gave this officious anſwer: if you are a ſoothſayer you muſt quietly begone from hence; but if you are a king you muſt not let ſlip ſo fair an opportunity, but hold the ox faſt by both his horns; alluding thereby to Ithome and Acro-Corinth, which were called the two horns of Peloponneſus. The king, however, would have Aratus by all means to give his opinion, who told him, that if the place could be kept without breach of faith, he would do well to keep it, but if by ſeizing of Ithome he muſt loſe the ſtrongeſt caſtle he had, his credit, he thought it far more adviſeable to deliver it up to its owners. This advice Philip followed for the preſent, but ever after maintained a private grudge againſt Aratus, which he perceiving retired from court, and led a private life at Sicyon, where he had leiſure to repent his ever calling the Macedonians into Peloponneſus. Philip, having now got rid of ſo troubleſome a cenſor, marched his forces into Epirus, where he ſeized on the town of Oricum, and laid ſiege to Apollonia, which he was ſoon forced to raiſe in a moſt ſhameful manner, his camp being ſurprized by theRoman prætor Lævinus, and he forced to make his eſcape half naked. After this diſappointment he returned to Peloponneſus, not having yet laid aſide the thoughts of ſubjecting the Meſſenians. But they, being now on their guard, refuſed to admit him into their city; whereupon calling them his enemies, he laid waſte the whole country, and retired without being able to reduce the city, the Achæans, who were his confederates, refuſing to lend him any help for ſuch an enterprize; for Meſſene, as we have obſerved above, was at that time a member of the Achæan body. This backwardneſs of his confederates he aſcribed to Aratus, and therefore, as he did not now ſcruple to commit the moſt

Aratus retires from Philip's court.

henious

heinous crimes, he reſolved to ſacrifice both the father and ſon to his reſentment. He dared not employ open force and violence, in regard of their great reputation and the reſpect which was univerſally paid to their virtue, and therefore charged Taurion, one of his officers, to diſpatch firſt the elder Aratus, ſecretly during his abſence. Taurion obeyed the wicked command, though not without ſome reluctance; he inſinuated himſelf into Aratus's friendſhip and often invited him to dinner, which gave him an opportunity of poiſoning him with a poiſon, which was ſure, but ſlow in its operation. Aratus was not ignorant of the lingering diſtemper which he fell into; but reflecting that complaints would only ſtir up the Achæans againſt him and create new diſturbances, he bore it patiently, as if it had been a common and natural diſeaſe. One day only happening to ſpit blood before one Cephalion, who was his boſom friend and ſeemed ſomewhat ſurprized, he ſaid, Behold, my dear Cephalion, the effect of friendſhip with kings. This brought him to his end in Ægium, being then in the fifty-ſeventh year of his age, and prætor of the Achæans the ſeventeenth time. The Achæans were for burying him in the place where he died, but the Sicyonians claimed this honour, as due to the place where he was born. Accordingly, changing their grief into mirth, they went, crowned with chaplets of flowers and clad in white robes, to bring the body of their deceaſed hero to Sicyon, dancing before it, and ſinging hymns and odes in commendation of his eminent virtues and exalted qualities. He was interred with the utmoſt pomp and ſolemnity in the higheſt part of the city, which was ever after called Aratium. The Achæans decreed, that divine honours ſhould be paid him, and appointed a prieſt for that purpoſe. Plutarch tells us, that in his time two ſolemn ſacrifices were ſtill offered him annually; the firſt on the day that he freed the city from the yoke of tyranny, and this ſacrifice was called Soteria, the other on his birth day. During the ſacrifice the young men and children walked round the altar, ſinging odes to the lyre in honour of their deliverer, and the ſenate, crowned with garlands of flowers, followed the proceſſion. To this they are ſaid to have been encouraged by an oracle of Apollo[q].

Philip cauſes him to be poiſoned. Year of the flood 2787. Before Chriſt 216.

ARATUS was without all doubt one of the greateſt men of his time, and may juſtly be ſtyled one of the founders of

[q] Polyb. lib. viii. p. 518, 519. Plut. in Arato.

of the Achæan republic, he having brought it to that form and ſplendor by which it became one of the moſt powerful ſtates of Greece. However, his talent lay more in contriving a warlike ſtratagem, in forming and projecting extraordinary enterprizes, than in executing them. In his adminiſtration he was guilty of one very great error, which was the calling in the kings of Macedon to the aſſiſtance of the republic, an expedient which no well-wiſher to his country could approve of, and was the more diſhonourable in him as he was prompted to it out of jealouſy to Cleomenes king of Sparta. For that prince, after having reduced the Achæans to the laſt extremity, was willing to reſtore them their priſoners and all the places he had taken, on condition they would create him prætor of Achaia. The Achæans were inclined to accept of a peace on theſe terms: But Aratus, thinking it would be very diſhonourable for him, who had bore for many years the chief ſway in the republic, to be thus ſupplanted by a young man, uſed his utmoſt efforts to diſſuade the Achæans from yielding to the conditions propoſed by Cleomenes; and becauſe they could no longer hold out againſt that warlike prince with their own ſtrength, he had recourſe to Antigonus king of Macedon, put him into poſſeſſion of Acro-Corinth, and thereby enabled him and his ſucceſſors to manage the affairs of Greece at their pleaſure [r]. But for this he atoned, both with his own death and with that of his ſon, which was more deplorable; for Philip, growing completely wicked, as Plutarch expreſſes it, commanded a kind of poiſon to be given him, which deprived him of his underſtanding, and prompted him to commit ſuch abominable actions, as would have reflected eternal ignominy on his name, had they been done deliberately and while he was in his ſenſes; inſomuch that, though he was then in the flower of his age, his death was looked upon not as a misfortune, but as the greateſt bleſſing that could befal himſelf and his family [s].

THESE inhuman and tyrannical proceedings in Philip highly incenſed the Achæans againſt him, as he afterwards found by experience, when they were more at liberty to act as they pleaſed. At preſent they were not in a condition to ſupport themſelves without him, the Ætolians, their irreconcileable enemies, having entered into an alliance with the Romans againſt the king and his confederates.

[r] Plut. in Cleom. & Arat. [s] Plut. ibid.

rates. The main article of this new alliance was, that the conquests should belong to the allies, but the booty and slaves to the Romans. Their calling in thus the Barbarians, for so the Greeks styled all nations except their own, provoked them more against the Ætolians, than all the mischief Philip had done them. Wherefore they resolved in their general assembly to join the king against the Ætolians and their confederates. Thus a new war was kindled in Greece, between Philip and the Achæans on one side, and the Romans, Ætolians, Lacedæmonians, Eleans, king Attalus, and Scerdilaidas on the other. The Ætolians immediately began hostilities, invading and laying waste the Achæan territories. Whereupon the Achæans dispatched deputies to Philip, who was then in Thrace, imploring his assistance. Philip readily complied with their request; but the Ætolians, being joined by some Romans and the forces which Attalus had brought with him out of Asia, marched out to meet him before his conjunction with the Achæans. Both armies met near Lamia a city of Thessaly. The Ætolians were commanded by Pyrrhias, who had been that year appointed their general, in conjunction with king Attalus. Philip proffered him battle, and he thinking it would be disreputable in him to decline it the very first year of his command, rashly engaged and was entirely defeated. However, to retrieve his reputation, he gathered together the scattered remains of his army, in hopes of performing some worthy action before the end of the campaign: But Philip attacked him the second time, cut most of his men in pieces, and obliged the rest to shut themselves up in Lamia. This double overthrow so disheartened the Ætolians, that they sent embassadors to treat of a peace with Philip and the Achæans; for the Romans, after having put the Ætolians in motion, were retired to Corcyra, fully persuaded, that the king had so much business upon his hands at home, that he could not have time to think of Italy or Hannibal. Philip put off the negotiations of peace till the next assembly of the Achæans, and in the mean time granted the Ætolians a truce of thirty days. When the assembly met, the Ætolian embassadors being introduced made such unreasonable proposals, as took away all hopes of an accommodation. Whereupon Philip and the Achæans, being resolved to pursue the war at all events, began to make greater preparations than ever, having so many enemies to oppose at the same time. The king, leaving

New troubles in Greece. Year of the flood 2792. Before Christ 211.

The Ætolians defeated.

leaving four thouſand men with the Achæans to defend their country, went to aſſiſt at the Nemæan games in the city of Argos, and from thence returning into Achaia marched, in conjunction with Cycliadus the Achæan prætor, againſt the city of Elis, which had received an Ætolian garriſon. After they had plundered the territory, they advanced in battle-array to the very gates of the city, hoping thereby to draw the Ætolians to an engagement. Accordingly they ſallied out, when Philip was greatly ſurprized to find, that the garriſon partly conſiſted of Romans. For Sulpitius, having left Naupactus with fifteen gallies and landed four thouſand men, had entered the city the night before the engagement. The fight was very bloody, and many fell on both ſides. In the heat of the combat Damophantes, general of the Elean horſe, ſpying Philopœmen, who commanded that of the Achæans, advanced againſt him with great ardor and fury. The latter waited for him without ſtirring from his poſt, and having unhorſed him at the firſt encounter, fell upon the enemy's cavalry with ſuch reſolution, that they quickly betook themſelves to flight. But the Romans charging the Macedonians with great vigour, the latter began to give way, which Philip obſerving ſpurred on his horſe, and ruſhed headlong into the midſt of the Romans, where his horſe being wounded threw him. The Macedonians then returned with new vigour to the charge, each party ſignalizing themſelves in a very extraordinary manner, the Romans with a view to take the king priſoner, and the Macedonians to ſave him. The king was carried off in ſpite of the utmoſt efforts of the Romans, and the Macedonians obliged to retire at a greater diſtance from the town. The next day Philip inveſted and took a ſtrong hold of the Eleans, where he found a great booty conſiſting of twenty thouſand head of cattle, beſides four thouſand Eleans whom he ſold for ſlaves. This made amends for his diſappointment at Elis [t]: But in the main time news was brought him, that the Dardanians had made an incurſion into Macedon; whereupon, he immediately ſet out to defend his own country, leaving with the Achæans a body of two thouſand five hundred men. At the ſame time Sulpitius ſailed back with his fleet to Ægina, where he joined king Attalus and paſſed the winter. During the king's abſence, the Philopœmen's gallant behaviour.

Achæans

[t] Polyb. l. x. p. 612. & ſeq. Liv. lib. xxvii. n. 29. 33. Plut. in Philop.

Achæans gained a conſiderable victory over the Ætolians and Eleans near the city of Meſſene.

Oreum in Eubœa betrayed to the Romans. Year of the flood 2796. BeforeChriſt 207.

EARLY in the ſpring Sulpitius and Attalus, quitting their winter quarters, ſailed with their fleets to Lemnos, and thence advanced to Oreum a chief city of Eubœa, which was treacherouſly delivered up to them by Plator the Macedonian commander. Attalus laid ſiege to the city of Opus in Achaia, which Philip having notice of advanced with incredible diligence to the relief of his allies, having marched upwards of ſixty miles in one day. The city had ſurrendered a little before his arrival, but Attalus the inſtant he heard of his approach abandoned it, and retired with precipitation to his ſhips [u].

WHILE Philip was thus employed againſt Attalus and the Romans, Machanidas, who had ſucceeded Lycurgus tyrant of Lacedæmon, advanced at the head of a powerful army to the borders of Achaia, with a deſign to lay waſte the country, and by that means oblige Philip to leave the enemy and relieve his allies. He could not have choſe a more improper ſeaſon for ſuch an expedition; for Philopœmen had been that year appointed for the firſt time commander in chief of the Achæan forces. As we ſhall often have occaſion to mention this great warrior, it will not be improper to ſay ſomething here of the extraordinary parts, which rendered him worthy of all thoſe honours, that were afterwards heaped upon him by the Achæan republic. He was born in Megalopolis a city of Arcadia in Peloponneſus, and from his very infancy diſcovered a ſtrong inclination to the profeſſion of arms. He was nobly educated by Caſſander of Mantinea, a man of great probity and uncommon abilities. He was no ſooner able to bear arms, but he entered among the troops which the city of Megalopolis ſent to make incurſions into Laconia, and in theſe inroads never failed to give ſome remarkable inſtance of his prudence and valour. When there were no troops in the field, he uſed to employ his leiſure in hunting and ſuch other manly exerciſes. Thus he ſpent his time till he attained the thirtieth year of his age, when Cleomenes king of Sparta attacked Megalopolis. We have ſeen what courage and greatneſs of ſoul he diſplayed on that occaſion. He ſignalized himſelf no leſs ſome time after in the

Philopœmen appointed prætor of the Achæans.

His character.

[u] Liv. ibid.

the battle of Selaſia, where Antigonus gained a complete victory over Cleomenes. Antigonus, who had been an eye-witneſs of his prudent and gallant behaviour, made him very advantageous offers to gain him over to his intereſt. But he rejected them with ſcorn, having an utter averſion to a court life, which he compared to that of a ſlave, ſaying, that the courtier was but a ſlave of a better condition. As he could not live idle and unactive, he went over to the iſle of Crete, which was then engaged in war, and ſerved there as a volunteer, till he acquired a complete knowledge of the military art; for the inhabitants of that iſland were in thoſe days accounted excellent warriors, being ſcarce ever at peace among themſelves. Philopœmen, having ſerved ſome years among the troops of that iſland, returned home, and was upon his arrival appointed general of the horſe, in which command he behaved ſo well, that the Achæan horſe, heretofore of no reputation, became in a ſhort time famous all over Greece. He was ſoon after appointed general of all the the Achæan forces, when he applied himſelf in good earneſt to the re-eſtabliſhing of military diſcipline among the troops of the republic, which he found in a very poor condition, and univerſally deſpiſed by their neighbours. Aratus indeed was the firſt that raiſed the Achæan ſtate to that pitch of power and glory to which it arrrived; but the ſucceſs of his enterprizes was not ſo much owing to his courage and intrepidity, as to his prudence and politics. As he depended on the friendſhip of foreign princes and their powerful ſuccours, he neglected the military diſcipline at home. But the inſtant Philopœmen was created prætor or commander in chief, as he was a great captain, he rouzed the courage of his countrymen, in order to put them in a condition to defend themſelves without the aſſiſtance of, or dependence on, foreign princes. With this view he made great improvements in the diſcipline, changing the manner of their exerciſe and likewiſe their arms, which were both very defective. He had thus for the ſpace of eight months exerciſed his troops every day, making them perform all the military motions and evolutions, and accuſtoming them to manage with dexterity their new arms, when news was brought him, that Machanidas was advancing at the head of a numerous army to invade Achaia. He was glad of this opportunity to try how the troops had profited by his diſcipline, and accordingly taking the field, met the enemy in the territories of Mantinea. Machanidas had brought into the field a vaſt quantity of military engines to gall the Achæans during the engagement and diſorder their ranks. To prevent this danger, Philopœmen ordered his light-armed troops to advance a great way before the reſt of the army, which Machanidas obſerving, thought proper to ſend his light-armed foot to make head againſt them and obſerve their motions. Thus the battle began, and each general ſending new ſupplies, the mercenary foot came to a cloſe engagement, being ſo far advanced before the main bodies of their reſpective armies, that they could know only by the duſt they raiſed which party advanced, and which gave ground. By this means the engines, which Machanidas chiefly relied upon, were hindered from doing execution by the interpoſition of his own men. The firſt onſet was very furious, and the ſucceſs a long time doubtful, but at laſt the mercenaries in the tyrant's army prevailed, their numbers and the ſkill they had acquired, by being ſo long inured to a military life, giving them the ſuperiority. The Illyrians in Philopœmen's army being but lately come, and not yet well exerciſed in the uſe of their arms, could not withſtand ſo furious an onſet, and were therefore entirely broke, and obliged to ſave themſelves with the utmoſt precipitation under the walls of Mantinea, about a mile from the field of battle. Philopœmen was ſo far from being diſcouraged at the ill ſucceſs of the firſt attack, that turning to thoſe who were about him, The flight of our mercenaries, ſaid he, will give us a complete victory. He obſerved, that Machanidas, inſtead of making uſe of this diſadvantage, and falling that inſtant on the main body, ſuffered himſelf to be hurried away by the fire and impetuoſity of his ſoldiers, in purſuit of thoſe who were flying. He was no ſooner out of ſight, but Philopœmen advanced againſt the Lacedæmonians that were drawn up before him. The two armies were parted by a ditch, dry at that time and therefore eaſily paſſable, eſpecially by the foot. The Lacedæmonians, elated with the ſucceſs of their mercenaries and deſpiſing the Achæans, ventured over the ditch to meet them; but as that put them into ſome diſorder, Philopœmen, taking advantage of their confuſion, charged them with ſuch vigour, that they were drove into the ditch again; which ſo diſordered their ranks, that not being able to make head againſt the Achæans, who purſued them cloſe and in good order, they betook themſelves to flight. Philopœmen, who knew knew better how to uſe his victory than Machanidas had done, ſuffered only part of his army to purſue the flying enemy; a ſtrong body he kept with himſelf to guard a bridge that lay over the ditch, knowing that Machanidas muſt return that way. Accordingly on his return he made directly to the bridge, but was greatly diſpirited when he found that the enemies were maſters of it, and his own army driven out of the field. However, with a ſtrong body of horſe he attempted to make his way through and join the reſt of his army; but he met with ſo warm a reception from Philopœmen, that his horſe were at the firſt onſet put to the rout. Machanidas himſelf, attended only by two horſemen, rode along the ditch, looking for a convenient place to get over. He was eaſily known by his purple mantle and the coſtly trappings of his horſe. Philopœmen therefore, appointing another to command at the bridge in his room, followed Machanidas at a ſmall diſtance, waiting till he ſhould attempt to croſs the ditch; which he no ſooner did, than Philopœmen ſpurring on his horſe attacked him in the ditch, and there ſlew him with his own hand. His head he ſtruck off, and carried it from rank to rank to encourage his victorious Achæans, who continued the purſuit with great ſlaughter and incredible ardour to the city of Tegea, which they entered together with the fugitives. The Lacedæmonians loſt on this occaſion above eight thouſand men, of which four thouſand were killed on the ſpot, and as many taken priſoners. The loſs of the Achæans was very inconſiderable, and thoſe that fell were moſtly mercenaries [w].

He defeats Machanidas tyrant of Sparta. Year of the flood 2797. Before Chriſt 206.

Philopœmen kills Machanidas.

THE Achæans, to perpetuate the memory of this victory, which was entirely owing to the conduct of their general, caſt a brazen ſtatue, repreſenting Philopœmen in the ſame attitude in which he killed the tyrant, and placed it in the temple of Apollo at Delphos.

THIS victory over the Lacedæmonians, and the many advantages gained by Philip over the Ætolians, inclined the Ætolian faction to ſue for a peace in good earneſt. King Attalus was returned home to defend his own kingdom againſt Pruſias king of Bithynia, who had invaded it. The Romans had ſo much buſineſs on their hands at home, Aſdrubal being ready to enter Italy and join his brother, that they they concerned themſelves very little with the affairs of Greece, leaving their friends there to ſhift for themſelves. The Ætolians therefore, finding themſelves thus deſerted by their moſt powerful allies, concluded a peace with Philip and the Achæans upon very diſadvantageous conditions. Scarce was the peace agreed on when P. Sempronius the proconſul arrived with ten thouſand foot, a thouſand horſe, and thirty-five gallies, to ſuccour the Ætolians. When he heard how affairs went in Greece, he was very much offended at the Ætolians, for concluding a peace without the conſent of the Roman ſenate, contrary to the expreſs words of the treaty. However, he was eaſily prevailed upon to come into their meaſures, and in the name of his republic ſtrike up a peace with Philip and his allies. For the year following it was agreed, by the mediation of the Epirots and Acarnanians, that the Romans and Philip ſhould be included in the treaty, and thenceforth live in amity. Philip cauſed the king of Bithynia, the Achæans, the Bæotians, the Theſſalians, Acarnanians, and Epirots, to be included in the treaty; the Romans on their ſide named king Attalus, Pleuratus a petty prince of Illyricum, Nabis tyrant of Sparta, the people of Elis, the Meſſenians, and the Athenians. This peace was very acceptable to both parties; to Philip, that he might have leiſure to ſettle the affairs of his own kingdom; to the Romans, that they might carry on the war againſt the Carthaginians with more vigor [x].

A general peace concluded. Year of the flood 2799. Before Chriſt 204.

[w] Polyb. l. xi. p. 629. 631. Plut. in Philop.

THE peace thus concluded was not of long continuance. Philip, having ſettled his affairs at home, and finding that the fortune of the Carthaginians his friends in the weſt declined apace, began to ſtudy how he might enlarge his dominions in the eaſt. Accordingly he invaded at the ſame time the Rhodians, the Athenians, and king Attalus, contrary to the late treaty of peace. Whereupon war was declared againſt him by the Romans, and Sulpitius the conſul appointed to carry it on. The Achæans and Lacedæmonians joined with Philip; the former he gained over to his intereſt by reſtoring to them the cities of Orchomenos, Heræa, and Triphylia, which he had formerly appropriated to himſelf. He likewiſe put the Megalopolitans in poſſeſſion of the city of Aliphera, to which they laid claim, and by theſe means kept them for ſome time in his alliance [y]. The Romans watched all opportunities of engaging ſo powerful a people in their intereſt, and at laſt found a very favourable one

The Achæans join Philip againſt the Romans.

[x] Liv. l. xxix. n. 12. [y] Liv. l. xxxii. n. 5.

one. When the Roman conſul Sulpitius arrived firſt in Greece, one Cycliades was prætor of the Achæans, a man entirely devoted to the Macedonian party, being ſupported in his tyrannical government by the protection of Philip. The Achæans, ſuſpecting that he aimed at an abſolute power, and was concerting meaſures with the Macedonians to bring their republic under ſubjection, as Nabis had lately done at Sparta, expelled him, and put the government into the hands of Ariſtenes, who, on all occaſions, had given ſignal proofs of his affection to the Romans. This opportunity the conſul laid hold of to bring Achaia into an alliance with Rome, but left the execution of the deſign to his brother Quinctius, who immediately ſent a deputation to the Achæans, offering to put them in poſſeſſion of Corinth, which had formerly belonged to them, if they joined with the Romans. This was a powerful attractive. However, as Philip had done them many important ſervices, they were unwilling to diſoblige him. Beſides, they were under no ſmall apprehenſion of Nabis tyrant of Lacedæmon, who had openly declared for Philip. At the ſame time they were afraid of the Romans, who ſeemed to be an over-match for the Macedonians. Theſe were the diſpoſitions of the Achæans, when they aſſembled at Sicyon to hear the Roman embaſſadors, who came attended with deputies from king Attalus, the Rhodians, and the Athenians, on purpoſe to diſpel their fears, and make the ſtrongeſt impreſſions on the minds of ſo wary a people. Philip likewiſe ſent an embaſſador to the aſſembly, named Cleomedon, whoſe intrigues the Romans had reaſon to fear, he being a man of great intereſt in Achaia. The embaſſadors being introduced, L. Calpurnius, who ſpoke for the Romans, was firſt heard; after him the deputies from Attalus and the Rhodians; and then Cleomedon. What the latter ſaid was heard with great attention; but the Athenians, who ſpoke the laſt, effaced in a great meaſure the prejudices which Cleomedon had raiſed. All theſe different ſpeeches divided the Achæans more than ever; inſomuch that they broke up the ſeſſion, which had laſted the whole day, without coming to any reſolution.

The Achæans ſollicited by Quinctius to declare for the Romans.

THE next day the aſſembly met again, the deputies only of the Achæan cities being admitted to give their opinions, and come to ſome final reſolution. An herald, as was the cuſtom, invited thoſe to ſpeak who had a right of voting; but they all continued in a deep ſilence, gazing at one another, and not daring to pronounce in ſo perplexed an affair.

At laſt Ariſtenes, preſident of the aſſembly, broke ſilence, and addreſſed the deputies in this manner: What is become of that warmth and vigour, with which you uſed to diſpute at your banquets, ſometimes contending for Philip againſt the Romans, and ſometimes for the Romans againſt Philip? You were then deciſive, and now in an aſſembly ſummoned for no other purpoſe, after hearing the ſpeeches and reaſons on both ſides, you are mute. If the love of your country cannot extort a word from you, will not your inclination for one or the other party looſe your tongues? eſpecially as you know that it will be too late to ſpeak after the reſolution ſhall be once taken [z].

THESE reproaches, however reaſonable and judicious, could not prevail with any of the members to give their opinion. There was an univerſal ſilence in the aſſembly, till Ariſtenes reſumed the diſcourſe, and in a long harangue repreſented to them the ſituation of their affairs, urging the neceſſity of their joining the Romans, who, he ſaid, were in a condition to force them to the compliance which they had condeſcended to requeſt. But his diſcourſe did not bring the Achæans to an agreement among themſelves. The diſputes grew warm, ſome applauding what Ariſtenes had ſaid, and others oppoſing it with great violence. Even the demiurgi or heads of the deputies were not unanimous. Five of the ten were for decreeing an alliance with the Romans. The other five proteſted againſt it, declaring, that it was againſt law to decree any thing in the aſſembly with relation to their alliance with Philip. And indeed that prince had cauſed a clauſe to be inſerted in his treaty with the Achæans to this effect, that the affair of his alliance ſhould no more be canvaſſed in the general aſſembly. The aſſembly was to ſit but one day longer, and even this ſhort time was ſpent in warm diſputes, the father diſagreeing with the ſon, and the deputies of one and the ſame city being ready to fall upon one another. Memnon of Pellene was ſteady for Philip; and his father, whoſe name was Rhiaſius, no leſs ſanguine for Rome. The father conjured him a long time not to oppoſe the welfare of his country; but finding that his prayers did not avail, he openly proteſted, that he would treat him as an enemy, and put him to death in caſe he did not yield to his opinion. Such menaces, uttered by a father, made ſo deep an impreſſion in the mind of Memnon, that he immediately came over to the party of Rome. At laſt laſt the majority were for the Romans; but before the decree was paſſed, the deputies of Dyme, and Megalopolis, and ſome of the Argians withdrew from the aſſembly; which no one took offence at, becauſe they had particular obligations to Philip. The deputies of the other cities followed the moſt prudent advice, and immediately concluded an alliance with Attalus and the Rhodians, but deferred the entire concluſion of that with the Romans, till the return of the embaſſadors they ſent to Rome to obtain the ratification from the ſenate [a].

[z] Liv. l. xxxii. n. 22.

After long debates the Achæans conclude an alliance with the Romans.

BUT in the mean time the Achæans lent aſſiſtance to the Romans to reduce Corinth. The city was attacked on the ſide of Cenchrea by Quinctius, at the gate of Sicyon by the Achæans, and on the ſide of the port Lechæum by Attalus. They at firſt carried on the attack but very faintly, hoping that a quarrel would ſoon ariſe between the garriſon and the inhabitants. But Androſthenes, who commanded in the place for Philip, had gained the affection of the Corinthians, and being ſupplied with a reinforcement of fifteen hundred men, and a great many Roman deſerters, who expected no quarter if the city ſhould be taken, he obliged the beſiegers to drop the enterprize [b].

Corinth beſieged by the Romans and Achœans.

THEY were no ſooner retired than Philocles, one of king Philip's generals marched his troops into the heart of Achaia, which had lately joined the Romans, and drew near the city of Argos. He was not ignorant that the citizens ſtill retained an affection for the Macedonian party; for they had very lately given a ſignal proof of it. It had long been a cuſtom among the Argians to invoke Jupiter, Apollo, and Hercules, on the firſt day of their aſſembly, and add to the names of theſe gods that of the king of Macedon. But after the Achæans had entered into an alliance with the Romans, the herald, who pronounced the form, thought it his duty to omit Philip's name. This omiſſion diſpleaſed the Argians, who loudly demanded, that the king's name ſhould be joined to thoſe of the tutelary gods of their country. Philocles therefore, depending on this affection for his maſter, advanced his troops near Argos, and in the night poſted them on an eminence which overlooked the city. But the city was defended by a ſtrong garriſon, which the Achæans had placed there under the command of one Æneſidemus, who was greatly attached to the Roman intereſt. To him therefore Philocles ſent a meſſenger, ſummoning

The ſiege raiſed.

The Macedonians poſſeſs themſelves of Argos.

Year of the flood 2806. Before Chriſt 197.

[a] Liv. bid. [b] Liv. ibid. n. 25.

moning him to deliver up the city, which he could not defend againſt the Macedonians without, and the citizens within, the walls, who were all of the ſame mind, and determined to ſhake off the Roman yoke. This ſummons did not move the brave commander, who thought himſelf in a condition to withſtand the menaces of the Macedonian, though his garriſon conſiſted only of five hundred men. But he was not a little ſurpriſed, when he ſaw all the citizens take up arms, and in a tumultuous manner command him to march out of the city. Æneſidemus well knew it was a raſh and fruitleſs attempt to oppoſe the multitude with ſuch an handful of men; he had alſo compaſſion for the brave youth under his command; and therefore having agreed that they ſhould march out unmoleſted, continued himſelf in the city with a ſmall number of his friends and clients. Philocles, ſurprized to ſee the commander remain in his poſt after the ſoldiers were gone, ſent to aſk him, Why he continued in the city, and what he intended to do? To which the brave Achæan anſwered, To die in the place committed to my care; whereupon Philocles ordered his Thracians to diſcharge their arrows at him, which they did accordingly, and he fell dead upon his buckler. Thus, notwithſtanding the alliance which the Achæans had concluded with the Romans, Philip ſtill poſſeſſed two of their ſtrongeſt cities, Corinth and Argos [c].

Argos delivered up to Nabis.

It was of the utmoſt importance for Philip to preſerve the city of Argos; but the difficulty was how to continue maſter of a place in the heart of Achaia, and at ſo great a diſtance from his hereditary dominions. He therefore delivered it up to the famous Nabis, who had uſurped the ſovereignty of Lacedæmon, and was in a condition to defend it; the conditions upon which he delivered it were, that he ſhould poſſeſs it as his own, if Philip loſt his life in the war, but reſtore it, if he were alive at the concluding of a peace. The tyrant willingly complied with theſe conditions, having nothing in view but to plunder the place, and enrich himſelf with the ſpoils of the unfortunate Argians, who, foreſeeing what muſt befal them, refuſed to admit the Lacedæmonians within their walls. But Nabis, by the help of Philocles, was brought into the city in the night, and before the inhabitants were aware, had poſſeſſed himſelf of all the advantageous poſts, and cauſed the gates to be ſhut. Some of the chief magiſtrates made their eſcape in the tumult, mult, and this the tyrant made uſe of as a pretence to begin his depredations. He confiſcated the eſtates of thoſe that had fled; and then, knowing that no body was able to oppoſe him, ſet no bounds to his oppreſſions. He commanded the inhabitants to bring him all their gold, ſilver, and jewels, putting to the rack, and treating like ſlaves, ſuch as he ſuſpected to conceal any part of their riches. He aſſembled the magiſtrates, and at their firſt meeting notified to them two decrees, which he obliged them to paſs; by the firſt, he cancelled all old debts; and by the ſecond ordered a new diviſion to be made of the lands, whereof every citizen ſhould have an equal ſhare. Thus he ſet the rich againſt the poor, and put the whole city in a flame [d].

[c] Liv. l. xxxii. c. 25.

Nabis joins the Romans.

Nabis was ſenſible he could not keep Argos without a powerful protection, and therefore forgetting on what conditions he held it, embaſſadors were ſent to Flaminius and Attalus inviting them to an interview. The proconſul and Attalus accepted of the invitation, without examining very nicely into the injuſtice and treachery of the tyrant, and a place near Argos was appointed for their conferences. In the interview Flaminius inſiſted upon two conditions; firſt, that Nabis ſhould put an end to the war in Achaia; and ſecondly, that he ſhould furniſh the confederates with his contingent of troops to act againſt Philip. The tyrant agreed to the ſecond article, but would allow only a four months truce with the Achæans. The treaty, however, was concluded, and Nabis, who was ſo infamous for cruelty and injuſtice, joined in confederacy with the Romans, which reflected no ſmall diſhonour on their general [e].

The Achæans continued ſteady in the Roman intereſt during the whole courſe of this war, and their prætor Nicoſtratus ſignalized himſelf on the following occaſion. Philip had left one Androſthenes with a body of ſix thouſand men in Corinth, to protect that city and its diſtricts, from the inſults of the Achæans and other Greeks of the Roman faction. Androſthenes, thinking it beneath him to be thus confined within the narrow bounds of the Corinthian territory, marched out at the head of his little army, and overrun great part of Achaia. Nicoſtratus the Achæan prætor had but two thouſand men under his command, and theſe were too few to oppoſe the ſuperior forces of the Macedonian, who advanced to the very walls of Sicyon, to inſult

[d] Liv. ibid. c. 28. [e] Liv. ubi ſupra. Polyb. l. xiii. ſub finem, Plut. in Flamin.

the prætor there in garriſon. As Androſthenes was under no apprehenſion of being attacked by ſo contemptible a foe, his troops were often diſperſed in ſmall bodies, and his army ſcarce ever in one place. This gave Nicoſtratus hopes of being able to ſurprize him. And accordingly he ſent orders to the garriſons of the neighbouring cities to appear at a general rendezvous, on a day appointed, at a little city called Apelaurum in Argolis. His orders were obeyed, and the prætor ſet out from thence at the head of five thouſand ſeven hundred foot, and three hundred horſe. The horſe he detached to obſerve the enemies motions, and by them received advice, that they were encamped on the river Nemea (N), between Corinth and Sicyon, and that the Macedonian having divided his army into three bodies, had detached one into the territory of Sicyon, another into that of Pellene (O), and the third towards Phlius (P). Upon this advice Nicoſtratus placed his mercenaries in a foreſt, through which the Macedonians were to paſs in their return to Corinth; while he led the reſt in two bodies to attack Androſthenes in his camp. The Macedonians were greatly ſurprized when they ſaw the Achæans making directly to their camp. Androſthenes, ordering the trumpets to give the ſignal for aſſembling the troops that were ſtragling about in the villages, drew up the ſmall body he had with him on the banks of the river. But, the parties that were out not returning ſoon enough to join him, he was eaſily defeated. This advantage encouraged Nicoſtratus to fall upon the Macedonians that were laying waſte the territory of Sicyon; there few of them eſcaped, being ſurrounded on all ſides before they knew that the enemy had taken the field. As for thoſe who were ravaging the country about Pellene and Phlius, they were either murdered by the inhabitants, or cut

The Macedonians defeated by the Achæans.

(N) The river Nemea watered part of Peloponneſus, and diſcharged itſelf into the gulph of Corinth. It is now called the Largia.

(O) Pellene, called by Stephanus Pellina, was a city of Achaia Propria, and bordered upon the territory of Sicyon. Geniſtus, calls it Cercoba, and Le Noir gives it the name of Zarachas. The natives now call it Diacopont. It is about ſixty ſurlongs diſtant from the gulph of Corinth.

(P) This city Li y calls Phlaſius (7). We muſt take care not to confound it with another bearing the ſame name in Argolis. The Phlius here ſpoke of was in Achaia.

(7) Liv. lib. xxxiii. c. 14.

cut in pieces by the mercenaries, who lay concealed in the foreſt. This action freed Achaia from all fear of the Macedonians, and doubled Philip's concern, who heard of it a few days after the great overthrow which he received in the plain of Cynocephalæ [f].

THESE repeated loſſes obliged Philip at length to accept of a peace, on ſuch conditions as Rome and her allies were pleaſed to impoſe. The main article relating to Greece was, that Philip ſhould evacuate all the places he poſſeſſed in Greece, and withdraw his garriſons, before the celebration of the Iſthmian games (Q). Purſuant to this article, ten commiſſioners were ſent from Rome, to ſettle the affairs of Greece and reſtore each city to the full enjoyment of its former rights and privileges. All Greece received this news with the greateſt tranſports of joy. The Ætolians alone were diſcontented, and inveighed bitterly againſt the Romans, becauſe among the cities that were to be ſet at liberty, no mention was made of Corinth, Chalcis, Oreum, Eretria, and Demetrias, which were all in the hands of the Romans. The Ætolians ſuſpected, that Rome deſigned to appropriate them to herſelf, in which caſe Greece, ſaid they, would indeed change its maſters, but not its condition. The ſuſpicion of the Ætolians was not ill grounded; for the ten commiſſioners, purſuant to the inſtruction of the ſenate, had omitted the names of theſe cities with a deſign to keep them, as they were the keys of Greece, and thereby prevent Antiochus from entering that country. But the proconſul prevailed with them to extend the decree to all the cities in Greece, not one excepted. By this means the Achæans were put in poſſeſſion of Corinth. Nevertheleſs, it was reſolved in the council of the ten commiſſioners, that the citadel of Corinth, and the two cities of Demetrias and Chalcis, ſhould be held by the Romans, as long as they were under any apprehenſions of a war with Antiochus [g].

A peace concluded with Philip. Year of the flood 2807. Before Chriſt 196.

AND

[f] Liv. ibid. [g] Liv. l. xxxiii. c. 30, 35. Polyb. excerp. Legat. p. 795. 800. Plut. in Flam.

(Q) On the Iſthmus of Corinth ſome games were annually celebrated, and thence called Iſthmian. They are ſaid to have been inſtituted by Theſeus in honour of Neptune. The moſt ſkilful athletæ in Greece came thither to diſpute the prize in running, leaping, wreſtling, &c. This was one of the moſt numerous aſſemblies in Greece.

The Greeks declared free by the Romans.

AND now, the time of the Iſthmian games drawing near, the expectation of what was to be tranſacted there kept every body in ſuſpenſe. The decree of the Roman commiſſioners was not yet divulged, and the future fate of Greece was the topic of all converſations. Some, but very few hoped well; moſt of that numerous aſſembly could not be perſuaded, that the Romans would part with the cities they had taken. The multitude were in this uncertainty, when the appointed day came for beginning the games. The proconſul Flaminius, attended by the ten commiſſioners, took his place; ſilence was proclaimed by ſound of trumpet; and the herald advanced into the middle of the arena, as it were to pronounce the uſual form of words; but the Greeks to their great ſurprize heard him pronounce the following words: "The ſenate and people of Rome, "and Quinctius Flaminius proconſul, after having over-"come Philip and quieted Macedon, declare the Corinthi-"ans, the Phocians, the Locri, all the Eubœans in the "iſland, the Magneſians, the Theſſalians, the Perrhœbi, "the Achæans, and Phthiotes, free from all kind of ſervitude. "All theſe nations ſhall live in an independent ſtate, and "be governed only by their own laws." In this vaſt aſſembly all had not heard equally the voice of the herald, by reaſon of the noiſe and confuſion which immediately aroſe. Such as were at a greater diſtance left their places to aſk thoſe who were nearer what they had heard. At laſt there was an univerſal outcry from all corners of the ſtadium, demanding that the herald ſhould repeat the proclamation. Then the trumpet ſounded again, and the herald, with a more diſtinct and loud voice, proclaimed liberty to all the Greeks without exception. He was heard with the moſt profound ſilence, and not a ſingle word of the decree was loſt. And now, being fully aſſured of their happineſs, they expreſſed their ſatisfaction with ſuch tranſports of joy as are not to be conceived or imagined (R). They all crouded round

(R) Plutarch tells us, that the air was put into ſuch a violent agitation by the acclamations and ſhouts of ſo numerous a body of people, that ſome crows which were accidentally flying over the aſſembly, fell down in the arena (8).

(8) Plut. in Flam.

round Flaminius, calling him the deliverer of Greece, and preſſing to kiſs his hand. The croud was ſo great, and they threw ſo many crowns and garlands upon him, that he would have run the hazard of being ſtifled, had not the vigor of his age, being then in his thirty-third year, and that joy which ſo glorious a day raiſed in his breaſt, enabled him to undergo ſo great a fatigue. At length the games began, but the ſpectators could look at nothing but the protector and reſtorer of their liberties, admiring the diſintereſtedneſs of the Romans in general, and the conduct of the proconſul in particular [h]. But after all, Rome found her account in theſe acts of generoſity; for they gained her the hearts of the Greek nation, and by that means encreaſed her power without enlarging her dominions.

Demetrias, Chalcis, and Acro-Corinth evacuated by the Romans.

AFTER this the proconſul, to complete the work, convened a general aſſembly at Corinth, and there declared, that he would evacuate Demetrias, Chalcis, and Acro-Corinth; which he did accordingly, and then began to prepare for his journey to Rome. The Greeks, with tears in their eyes, aſſured him, that they ſhould ever retain a grateful remembrance of ſo gracious a protector; and to give him before his departure ſome pledge of their affection, they ſought for all the Romans that were reduced to ſlavery on the coaſts of Greece, and delivered them up to him. They amounted to twelve thouſand in number, the greateſt part of them having been taken by Hannibal in Italy and ſold to the Greeks. The Achœans alone bore the charge of their redemption, which came to a hundred talents. With this attendance the proconſul, after having withdrawn the Roman forces from Acro-Corinth, Demetrias, and Chalcis, embarked at Oricum on his return to Italy, leaving Greece to enjoy the happineſs which he had procured it [i].

Nabis left in poſſeſſion of Sparta.

THE only thing that reflected ſome diſhonour on Flaminius and ſtained his reputation was, his leaving the uſurper Nabis in poſſeſſion of Lacedœmon, without ever once mentioning in the treaty of peace the unhappy Ageſipolis, who was the lawful heir, and had fought during the war under the Roman ſtandards. Plutarch accounts for this ſtrange proceeding, and tells us, that Flaminius propoſed only ſuch conditions as he hoped the tyrant would not reject, being impatient to return to Rome, becauſe the reputation tation of Philopœmen began to eclipſe his. They were both in the ſame camp and in the ſame confederacy, and the ſoldiers in their diſcourſes often compared them together, always preferring the Greek general to the Roman. They imputed the proconſul's ſucceſſes to the bravery and intrepidity of his legions; but unanimouſly agreed, that Philopœmen's victories were entirely owing to himſelf. And truly, ſays our author, no one underſtood better than Philopœmen how to draw up an army, ſeize advantageous poſts, ſuit the diſpoſition of his troops to the ground, order evolutions at a proper time, make an attack ſeaſonably, or judge of the critical time for a retreat[k]. Flaminius on the other ſide, though inferior to the Achæan in the art of commanding armies, yet far ſurpaſſed him in all other virtues and qualifications. Nevertheleſs he was very uneaſy to ſee himſelf ſurpaſſed by a Greek, in that character which moſt dazzles the eyes of the multitude; and this made him ſo zealous for putting an end to the war, contrary to the opinion of the moſt judicious among the Greeks, who were for purſuing Nabis to the laſt extremities, knowing, that Greece would never enjoy a laſting peace, ſo long as Nabis enjoyed the crown of Lacedæmon.

[h] Plut. in Flam.

[i] Liv. l. xxxiv. c. 4. Plut. in Flamin.

WHAT they foreſaw was ſoon brought to paſs: For, not long after the departure of the Romans, Nabis began to raiſe inſurrections in the maritime cities, which he had been obliged to give up by the treaty of peace. As they were garriſoned by the Achæans, he attempted to drive them out, and even laid ſiege to Gythium, an important maritime city, which Flaminius had taken from him. Theſe hoſtilities obliged the Achæans to have recourſe to the Romans, who ſent the great Flaminius again into Greece to enquire into the ſtate of affairs on the ſpot. At his arrival he found Nabis yet engaged in the ſiege of Gythium, and the Achæans aſſembled at their general diet which was held at Sicyon: They had immediately recourſe to him and deſired his advice. The aſſembly were for taking up arms immediately and invading the Lacedæmonian territories; but Flaminius adviſed them to wait till the Roman fleet arrived, which the prætor Bœbius was ordered to bring to their aſſiſtance. Nevertheleſs the aſſembly was ſtill in ſuſpence what part to act, and the leading men were divided among themſelves; ſome were for following the advice of Flaminius, others for falling on the Lacedæmonians without loſs of time; they only waited for the deciſion of of Philopœmen, who was then prætor and preſided in the aſſembly. But that prudent general was not in haſte to give his opinion : " It is a wiſe inſtitution of ours, ſaid he, " that our prætors ſhall not deliver their opinions when the " aſſemblies are deliberating about war. It is your buſi- " neſs to determine what to do, and mine to execute " your orders ; and I will take all poſſible care that you " ſhall not repent of your choice, whether it be for war " or peace ". Theſe words inclined the aſſembly more powerfully to a war, than if he openly declared for it ; and a decree was iſſued, ordering troops to be levied without delay, and leaving the whole management of the war to Philopœmen [l].

The Achæans declare war againſt Nabis tyrant of Sparta. Year of the flood, 2812. Before Chriſt 191.

[k] Plut. In Flamin. & Philopœm.

THE brave Achæan, being inveſted with this power, was at firſt in doubt what to do; on one hand he thought it would be of great advantage to wait till the arrival of the Roman fleet, according to the advice of Flaminius ; on the other ſide he judged it might be dangerous to ſuffer Nabis to purſue the ſiege of Gythium, and expoſe the Achæan garriſon to the rage of the tyrant. He therefore took a middle way, which was to get ready the Achæan ſhips with a deſign to give the beſieged ſome relief, and ſuſpend the attacks of the enemy, at leaſt towards the ſea. But this deſign required a man of ſome experience in maritime affairs, whereas Philopœmen, tho' not inferior to any land-officer whatſoever, had never been on board a ſhip, but in order to go over to Crete as a paſſenger. However, he took upon him the command of the Achæan fleet, imagining that he ſhould be as ſucceſsful by ſea as he had been by land. But he found to his coſt, how uſeful experience is on all occaſions ; for Nabis, who had fitted out a few ſhips filled with rowers and ſoldiers uſed to ſea-fights, fell upon him, and at the very onſet diſperſed his fleet, took ſome of his ſhips, and ſunk others. Philopœmen himſelf was very near being taken, but, as he had the caution to go on board a light veſſel before the engagement, he made his eſcape, and, though purſued cloſe by the enemy, got ſafe into the port of Patræ [m].

Philopœmen defeated by ſea.

THE ſhame of this ill-concerted expedition did not diſcourage the brave Philopœmen, but only made him act with greater caution and prudence for the future. Nabis, elated with this advantage, thought that no more attempts would

He gains a complete victory over Nabis by land.

[l] Plut in Philop, Liv. lib. xxxv. c. 13.

[m] Plut. & ibid.

would be made to throw any ſuccours in Gythium, and therefore turning the ſiege into a blockade, left only the third part of his forces before the place, and with the reſt guarded the paſſes through which ſuccours might be brought to the beſieged city, eſpecially a port called Pleiæ. In this camp Philopœmen reſolved to attack the Lacedæmonians; and accordingly having gathered together ſome boats, and manned them with Achæans, he ordered them to advance towards Pleiæ, while he himſelf marched along the ſhore to the ſame place. Both the boats and Philopœmen with his army arrived at Pleiæ in the dead of the night, and found the enemy faſt aſleep without any watch, as thinking themſelves in a ſecure place. Upon the firſt ſignal fire-brands and burning matter were thrown from the boats, and the Achæan general at the ſame time ſurrounded the camp to fall on thoſe who made their eſcape. As the Lacedæmonians were not furniſhed with tents, they had made barracks of branches of trees, which taking fire obliged them to fly in great confuſion. But ſuch as eſcaped the flames were cut in pieces by the Achæans, who had ſeized on all the paſſes; ſo that very few got ſafe to the camp before Gythium. Philopœmen having thus retrieved his reputation, which had been ſomewhat leſſened by his maritime expedition, aſſembled the Achæans, in order to conſult with them about the meaſures he ſhould take for the relief of Gythium. It was reſolved in the aſſembly, that he ſhould advance to Lacedæmon, as if he deſigned to lay ſiege to that city. This, they thought, would be the only means to make a powerful diverſion, and force Nabis to raiſe the ſiege. But, in the mean time, the attacks being carried on with great vigour, the place was taken the very day that the Achæan army appeared before Lacedæmon. Nabis therefore, without loſs of time, haſtened to Lacedæmon, and found the Achæans marching through a narrow paſs, their ſeveral bodies being at a conſiderable diſtance from each other. Philopœmen was not a little ſurprized at the ſudden appearance of the enemy, and the narrowneſs of the place doubled his concern. However, without ſhewing any uneaſineſs, he drew up his men in the moſt artful manner poſſible. He poſted his Achæans in the firſt line, and behind them the Cretan auxiliaries. His cavalry he drew up by the ſide of a brook for the convenience of watering their horſes. He placed his baggage on the top of a rock with a detachment to guard it. In this diſpoſition he waited till the enemy

enemy came up, without fearing the conſequences of an engagement. In the mean time night drew on, and both armies remained in the ſame poſture. Philopœmen in the night-time poſted a ſtrong body of his beſt troops in a valley, ordering his horſe to retire till they drew the enemy into the ambuſcade he had laid for them. Early next morning the action began, and the horſe engaged firſt; the Achæan cavalry was commanded by Lycortas, the father of Polybius the hiſtorian. At firſt the diſpute was warm, and advantage equal. But Lycortas, according to the orders he had received, in the heat of the engagement began to give ground, and, retiring in good order drew the enemy into an ambuſcade; and then facing about attacked them in front, while the troops that lay concealed flanked them with incredible fury. The victory was then no more doubtful; the Lacedæmonian cavalry betook themſelves to a precipitous flight, and moſt of them would have been cut to pieces, had not the Achæan general who was more afraid of the narrow roads than of the enemy, ſounded a retreat. Nabis, ſuſpecting that Philopœmen deſigned to ſeize the paſſes leading to Lacedæmon and thereby cut off his retreat, marched off with part of his troops to prevent him. This report Philopæmen had cauſed to be ſpread in the Lacedæmonian camp, by one of his own men who fled thither as a deſerter; and accordingly took his advantage of it. For Nabis was no ſooner gone, but he attacked his ſon-in-law Pythagoras who was left to guard the camp, and forcing the trenches poſſeſſed himſelf of the baggage and warlike engines. He left a detachment in the enemies camp, and with the reſt of the army purſued the fugitives with great ſlaughter. The Lacedæmonians being now entirely diſperſed, he divided his army into a great many ſmall bodies, ordering them to lie concealed on the roads that led to the gates of Lacedæmon, being well appriſed, that by the favour of the night ſuch as were rambling in the woods would attempt to enter the city. His deſign ſucceeded, and the Lacedæmonians were either cut in pieces or taken priſoners, as they were in the dead of the night making towards the city. Thus the tyrant loſt the flower of his troops, and Philopœmen, after having laid waſte great part of Laconia, returned home loaded with ſpoils and glory [n].

But

[n] Plut. ibid, Liv. l xxxv. c. 28.

Sparta joined to the Achæan league. Year of the flood 2812. Before Chriſt 191.

BUT what moſt of all raiſed the fame and reputation of Philopœmen was, his joining the powerful city of Lacedæmon to the Achæan commonwealth, by which means the Achæans came to eclipſe all the other ſtates of Greece. This memorable event we have related at length in the foregoing chapter, and therefore ſhall only add here one circumſtance, which in our opinion reflects greater luſtre on Philopœmen than all his warlike exploits. The Lacedæmonians, overjoyed to ſee themſelves delivered from the oppreſſions they had long groaned under, ordered the palace and furniture of Nabis to be ſold, and the ſum accruing from thence, to the amount of a hundred and twenty talents, to be preſented to Philopœmen as a token of their gratitude. Deputies therefore were to be appointed, who ſhould carry the money and deſire Philopœmen in the name of the ſenate to accept of the preſent. And on this occaſion it was, ſays Plutarch, that the virtue of the generous Achæan appeared in its greateſt luſtre; for ſo great was the opinion which the Spartans had of his probity and diſintereſtedneſs, that no one could be found who would take upon him to offer the preſent. Struck with veneration and fear of diſobliging him, they all begged to be excuſed, At laſt they obliged by a public decree one Timolaus, who had formerly been his gueſt to go to Megalopolis, where Philopœmen lived, and offer him the preſent. Timolaus with great reluctance ſet out for Megalopolis, where he was kindly received and entertained by Philopœmen. Here he had an opportunity of obſerving the ſeverity of his whole conduct, the greatneſs of his mind, the frugality of his life, and the regularity of his manners, which ſtruck him with ſuch awe, that he did not dare once to mention the preſent he was come to offer him; inſomuch, that, giving ſome other pretence to his journey, he returned home with the preſent. The Lacedæmonians ſent him again, but he could no more prevail upon himſelf now, than the firſt time, to mention the true cauſe of his journey. At laſt going a third time. he ventured with the utmoſt reluctance to acquaint Philopœmen with the offer he had to make to him in the name of the Lacedæmonians. Philopœmen heard him with great calmneſs; but the inſtant he had done ſpeaking he ſet out with him to Sparta, where, after expreſſing the greateſt obligations to the Spartans, he adviſed them to lay out their money in corrupting and purchaſing chaſing the wicked, and ſuch as divided the citizens; and ſet them at variance with their ſeditious diſcourſes, to the end that, being paid for their ſilence, they might not occaſion ſo many diſtractions in the government. For it is much more adviſeable, ſaid he, to ſtop an enemy's mouth than a friend's; as for me, I ſhall always be your friend, and you ſhall reap the benefit of my friendſhip without expence [o]. Such was the diſintereſtedneſs of this brave Achæan.

A great inſtance of Philopœmen's diſintereſtedneſs.

THE Achæan republic was now become formidable; the addition of Lacedæmon had greatly encreaſed its power; but, at the ſame time diviſions ariſing among the confederate cities, the Romans began to let them know, that the republic of Achaia was in ſome degree ſubject to that of Rome. Meſſene and Elis, two cities of Achaia, had ſided with Antiochus and refuſed to come to the Achæan diet. Whereupon Diophanes at that time prætor raiſed ſome troops, and advanced at the head of them into the territories of the two rebellious cities, laying waſte the country, in order to bring them to their duty. The inhabitants had recourſe to Flaminius, who then reſided at Chalcis, proteſting, that they had rather ſurrender themſelves up to the Romans, than live ſubject to the Achæans. Flaminius immediately left Chalcis, and haſtening to Megalopolis, ſent orders from thence to Diophanes, enjoining him to deſiſt from hoſtilities and meet him at Megalopolis. The prætor obeyed, and Flaminius, after having gently reproved him for diſturbing the peace, adviſed him to diſband his troops, aſſuring him at the ſame time, that he would ſettle the affair of the Meſſenians and Eleans to the ſatisfaction of the Achæans. Accordingly he ſubjected them to the diet, and obliged them to deliver up the Achæan exiles they kept in their cities. This proceeding of Flaminius was greatly applauded by the Achæans, for the Meſſenians earneſtly entreated him to put a Roman garriſon into the city, proteſting that they had rather be ſubject to Rome than to Achaia. But Flaminius in ſo doing had another point in view, which was to perſuade the Achæans to deliver up to him the iſland of Zacynthus (S) which Meſſene and Elis revolt from the Achæans.

[o] Plut. in Philop.

(S) Zacynthus, now Zante, is a pretty conſiderable iſland in the Ionian ſea. It is ſaid to be twenty-five miles in length, twenty which they had lately purchaſed. Diophanes could not by any means be prevailed upon to part with it; whereupon Flaminius ordered the aſſembly to be called, and there gave a ſignal proof of his abilities, convincing the Achæans, that the parting with an iſland which they had lately purchaſed would prove very advantageous to their republic. The ſpeech he made on this occaſion is entirely accommodated to the genius of the Greeks. "I look on Achaia, ſaid he, as "a ſort of tortoiſe which nature hath guarded with its "ſhell. If it thruſts out its head or feet ever ſo little be-"yond its armour, it is in danger of being trod upon and "hurt. The frontier cities, which ſurround you, Achæ-"ans, are your ſhell and your natural defence. But as to any "acquiſitions beyond the continent, thoſe are parts of your "ſtate which are expoſed to inſults, and which you can-"not ſecure without being at a greater charge than they "are worth." This ſpeech, which was founded on good ſenſe, convinced the Achæans, that their new purchaſe would prove rather prejudicial than uſeful to their republic, and therefore they all unanimouſly voted, that it ſhould be delivered up to the Romans [q].

New diſputes among the Achæans.

It was not long, ere new diſputes aroſe among the Achæans, which gave the Romans a fair opportunity of exerting their authority even over their allies and thoſe very nations which they had declared free. The general aſſembly of the Achæans had been held time out of mind at Ægium; but Philopœmen, who was then prætor, thought fit to divide the honour and advantages, which thoſe aſſemblies brought to the places where they were held, among all the cities of the Achæan league, and had named Argos for the place of the next diet. But the inhabitants of Ægium oppoſed this regulation, and had recourſe to M. Fulvius Nobilior, who, after having reduced the Ætolians and made himſelf maſter of Cephalenia, reſided in that iſland to decide, as he ſaid, ſuch diſputes as ſhould ariſe between any of the Greek cities or republics. Thus, under the charac-

[q] Liv. l. xxxvi. c. 32.

ter

ty in breadth, and ſixty in circuit. It had for a long time belonged to Philip of Macedon, who had given it up to Amynander king of the Athamanes. This prince made the famous Philip of Megalopolis governor of it, and he transferred it to Hierocles of Sicily, who after the defeat of Antiochus at Thermopylæ ſold it to the Achæans.

ter of a peace-maker, he was in reality the ſovereign of Greece, and gave laws to the whole country. The iſland of Cephalenia being now in the hands of the Romans, a way was open for the legions into Peloponneſus, which was only divided from it by a ſmall arm of the ſea about twenty-four miles over. Fulvius therefore, upon the firſt notice of this diſpute, croſſed over into Peloponneſus, and the whole matter was referred to his determination. His inclination indeed led him to favour the inhabitants of Ægium; but ſeeing that the other party was far more numerous, he withdrew from the aſſembly without declaring his opinion. It was enough for him that the diſpute had been brought to his tribunal [r].

The Lacedæmonians attempt to withdraw themſelves from the Achæan league. Year of the flood 2814. Before Chriſt 189.

THE quarrel that aroſe between the Lacedæmonians and Achæans was of more conſequence. Flaminius had given all the places on the coaſt of Laconia to the Achæans, who kept garriſons in them, even after Lacedæmon had acceded to the Achæan league. This ſome of the leading men among the Lacedæmonians could not brook, and therefore, to deliver themſelves from this ſlavery, they attacked in the night a ſmall city on the coaſt called Las (T), but were repulſed by the inhabitants and the Lacedæmonian exiles, who there enjoyed quiet under the protection of Achaia. This attempt alarmed the exiles, who brought their complaints to the council of the Achæans. Philopœmen, who was an avowed friend and protector of the exiles, for they had been driven out for oppoſing the tyrant, was then prætor. He repreſented to the aſſembly the attempt upon Las as an inſult offered to all Achaia, and cauſed a decree to be enacted, commanding the Lacedæmonians to deliver up the authors of that enterprize, on pain of being treated as enemies. Embaſſadors were ſent to Lacedæmon to give them notice of this decree; but this ſerved only to exaſperate the minds of a proud people. They immediately put to death thirty of thoſe who were known to be in the Achæan intereſt, diſſolved their alliance with Achaia, and ſent embaſſadors to Fulvius the proconſul, entreating him to come and take poſſeſſion of their city. But theſe proceedings, and [r] Liv. l. xxxviii. c. 28—30.

(T) Las was ſituated on the Laconic gulph ſouth of Sparta, on a ſtony ſoil and in a country full of rocks, whence it borrowed its name; the word λᾶς ſignifying in Greek a ſtone.

the powerful protection which they were imploring, did not deter Philopœmen from declaring war againſt Lacedæmon. However, as the ſeaſon was far advanced, the Achæans contented themſelves with plundering part of the Lacedæmonian territory and haraſſing the inhabitants with frequent incurſions.

At the return of the ſpring, both parties made preparations for war, and hoſtilities were carried ſo far, that they forced Fulvius to leave Cephalenia and come into Peloponneſus. On his arrival he ordered an aſſembly to be convened at Elis, to diſcuſs the pretenſions of Achaia over Lacedæmon. But, after hearing both parties, he was ſo perplexed that he could come to no determination. He did all that lay in his power to reconcile the contending parties, but they were too untractable to come to an accommodation. He therefore adviſed them to ſend embaſſadors to Rome, and while the cauſe was trying there to ſuſpend all hoſtilities. They followed his advice, and deputies were immediately diſpatched to Rome. The Achæans appointed two great men to plead their cauſe, who were of a very different character. Theſe were Diophanes, a man of moderation and of a tractable diſpoſition, and Lycortas the father of Polybius, a man entirely addicted to Philopœmen. Diophanes referred the deciſion of the cauſe to the arbitration of the ſenate. Lycortas maintained the decree of Philopœmen, and urged, that it could not be reverſed without making void the regulations of Flaminius, who had committed the care of the coaſt to the Achæans. The ſenate was unwilling to diſguſt the Achæans, but at the ſame time thought the Lacedæmonians worthy of compaſſion. They returned therefore a dark and ambiguous anſwer, which each party interpreted in their own favour. The Achæans pretended that it gave them full power to inflict on the Lacedæmonians the puniſhment they deſerved. Whereupon Philopœmen, who was continued in his prætorſhip, taking the field, marched to the very walls of Lacedæmon, and there ſummoned the city to deliver up the authors of the attempt upon Las, promiſing that they ſhould not be condemned without a fair trial. Upon this promiſe all thoſe, whom Philopœmen demanded by name, ſet out for the Achæan camp, attended by the chief citizens of Lacedæmon, who looked upon their cauſe as their own. Being arrived at the camp their malecontent countrymen crouded round them, and with an inſulting air began to vent the moſt injurious injurious expreſſions againſt them. Nay, from words they came to blows, and the Achæan officers had occaſion to exert all their authority to appeaſe the tumult. As the Lacedæmonian exiles continued complaining of their hard treatment, they engaged the Achæan ſoldiers in their quarrel, and all on a ſudden fell upon the Lacedæmonians with ſuch fury, that ſeventeen of them were killed upon the ſpot. Seventy-three were with the greateſt difficulty reſcued out of the hands of the enraged multitude. Philopœmen did not intend to pardon them, but was unwilling it ſhould be ſaid that they had been condemned without a trial. They were therefore the next morning produced before the multitude, who, without ſcarce ſuffering them to anſwer for themſelves, condemned and executed them all. This ſevere proceeding ſtruck all the Lacedæmonians with ſuch terror, that they ſurrendered at diſcretion; and Philopœmen, whoſe main point in view was to humble the Lacedæmonians, treated them as if their city had been taken by ſtorm. He commanded them to demoliſh their walls, diſband all their mercenaries, drive out of their city all the ſlaves whom the tyrants had ſet at liberty, receive the exiles, and laſtly, renounce the laws of Lycurgus, and for the future govern themſelves only by thoſe of Achaia [s].

Lacedæmon reduced by the Achæans.

Hard conditions impoſed upon the city by Philopœmen.

THE Lacedæmonians readily demoliſhed their walls; for Lacedæmon had long ſubſiſted without any other defence but the bravery of its citizens. The recalling of the exiles was what they were moſt averſe to; but Philopœmen and the Achæans were inexorable, and would by all means have the exiles re-inſtated in their antient honours, from which they had been driven by the tyrants, But the moſt fatal blow was the abolition of the laws of the wiſe Lycurgus, which, ſevere as they were, the Lacedæmonians had obſerved for the ſpace of ſeven hundred years [t]. Such was the fate of one of the moſt illuſtrious cities of Greece (U).

THE Lacedæmonians ſent embaſſadors to Rome to complain of this cruel treatment; and Lepidus, who was then conſul, writ a letter to the Achæan confederacy, acquainting them,

The Lacedæmonians carry their complaints to Rome.

[s] Liv. l. xxxviii. c. 30——34. [t] Liv. ibid.

(U) This cruel treatment of ſo renowned a city as Sparta reflects no great honour on Philopœmen. Plutarch, who juſtly ranks him among the greateſt commanders of Greece, ſeems in a certain manner to palliate this action, ſince he could not juſtify it. His them, that the ſenate did not at all approve of ſuch inhuman proceedings. Hereupon the Achæans immediately diſpatched Nicodemus of Elis to Rome to juſtify their conduct. Upon his return he acquainted his republic, that Rome was not pleaſed with the ſubverſion of the government of Sparta, with the demolition of the walls, and the putting to death ſo many of the inhabitants; but at the ſame time did not annul the decrees which the aſſembly had enacted. Rome had then affairs of greater importance on her hands, and therefore put off the diſcuſſion of this point to a more proper ſeaſon [u].

The friendſhip of the Achæans courted by the princes of Aſia.

THE Achæan league was at this time in great repute all over the eaſt, and the friendſhip of ſo powerful a ſtate courted by all the princes of Aſia. Ptolemy king of Egypt ſent embaſſadors to renew his antient alliance with the Achæans, and to offer the republic ſix thouſand ſhields and two hundred talents. His offer was accepted, and Lycortas with two others deputed to thank him for the preſent, and renew the alliance. King Eumenes alſo ſent an embaſſy for the ſame purpoſe, offering a hundred and twenty talents, the intereſt of which ſhould be ſettled on the members of the publick council. Embaſſadors came likewiſe from Seleucus king of Syria, offering the republic, in the name of their ſovereign, ten ſhips of war completely equipped, and deſiring to have the antient treaty of alliance confirmed by the aſſembly. All theſe embaſſadors were heard in the diet, and the alliance with Ptolemy and Seleucus renewed; but it was not judged expedient to accept at that juncture of the ſhips which the latter offered. As for Eumenes, Apollonius of Sicyon exhorted in a long ſpeech the Achæans, not only to reject the preſent that was offered by his embaſſadors, but to look upon him as an enemy, ſince he attempted to bribe the members of that venerable aſſembly; which he would not have done, if he had not ſomething in view prejudicial to their true intereſt. His ſpeech was heard with great applauſe, and the renewing of the alliance poſtponed till a farther opportunity [w].

THE

[u] Polyb. in legat. c. 41. p. 850, 852. [w] Polyb. ibid.

His inſiſting upon the re-eſtabliſhment of the exiles was no way blameable; for moſt of them had been baniſhed by Machanidas, Lycurgus, and Nabis, for attempting to place on the throne Ageſipolis, to whom the kingdom of Sparta of right belonged. But all the other ſteps Philopœmen took on this occaſion betrayed a great deal of paſſion and a revengeful temper, which could not be ſatisfied but by the utter deſtruction of his enemies.

The Romans jealous of their power.

THE Romans, having now got the better of all their enemies in the eaſt, reſumed the cauſe of the Lacedæmonians, with a deſign to humble the Achæans, whoſe great power began to raiſe no ſmall jealouly at Rome. Three commiſſioners were therefore named, of which Q. Cæcilius was the chief, to go firſt into Macedonia, and from thence into Achaia, to examine matters on the ſpot. Theſe having ſettled the affairs of Macedon, purſuant to their commiſſion, haſtened to Peloponneſus. Ariſtenes, who was then prætor, hearing of their arrival, aſſembled all the chiefs of the republic at Argos, and invited Cæcilius with his collegues thither. Cæcilius, being introduced to the council, began his ſpeech by commending the zeal of the Achæans for the welfare of their country, and extolling the wiſdom of their governors. He then added, that he could not forbear telling them, that their behaviour towards the Lacedæmonians had been very much cenſured at Rome; and therefore he exhorted them to attone ſome way or other for their imprudent conduct on that occaſion. Ariſtenes, who acted under-hand in concert with Cæcilius, did not make any reply. Diophanes of Megalopolis, who was a profeſſed enemy to Philopœmen, made other complaints againſt him; but took no notice of his proceedings at Lacedæmon. Upon this Philopœmen, Lycortas, and Archon ſpoke in their turns, and their ſpeeches in defence of the late proceedings at Sparta made ſuch an impreſſion on the council, that when Cæcilius withdrew, they came to a reſolution, that nothing ſhould be altered in the decrees that had been enacted, and that this anſwer ſhould be given to the Roman commiſſioners. When Cæcilius heard it, he deſired that the general aſſembly might be convened. But they replied, that he muſt firſt produce a letter from the ſenate of Rome, whereby the Achæans ſhould be deſired to meet. As Cæcilius had no ſuch letter, they told him plainly that they would not aſſemble. This exaſperated the Roman to ſuch a degree, that he left Achaia without making any further enquiries [x].

ON his return to Rome, he acquainted the ſenate with what he had tranſacted in Peloponneſus. Whereupon Apollonidas, whom the Achæans had ſent to plead their cauſe before the ſenate, was introduced. He endeavoured to juſtify the conduct of Philopœmen and his countrymen, with reſpect to the Lacedæmonians, and told them for what reaſon they had refuſed to call, at the inſtance of Cæcilius, a general aſſembly. After the Achæan embaſſador, thoſe from Sparta were admitted. Philopœmen, as we have obſerved above, reſtored the Spartan exiles ; and theſe very exiles were the men, who ſince their return had moſt zealouſly contended for the recovery of the antient ſplendor and liberty of their native country. Two of theſe, Areus and Alcibiades, were, on this occaſion, appointed by the Lacedæmonians to implore the juſtice of the Roman ſenate. They repreſented, with great eloquence and in a very moving manner, the miſerable condition to which Sparta, once miſtreſs of Greece, was reduced ; how its walls were demoliſhed, and the citizens dragged into Achaia, and there ſold for ſlaves (W); how the ſacred laws of Lycurgus, to which Sparta owed her grandeur and glory, were entirely aboliſhed, &c.

[x] Polyb. in legat. c. 41. p. 853, 854.

THE ſenate, after hearing and weighing the reaſons on both ſides, ordered Appius Claudius and two others, who were ſoon to ſet out for Macedon, to put an end to this diſpute, and referred the contending parties to the judgment which they ſhould give on the ſpot in the aſſembly of the Achæans. In the mean time they required the Achæans to convene their general aſſembly whenever the Roman embaſſadors ſhould deſire it ; ſince the Roman ſenate admitted them as often as they required an audience [y].

SOMETIME before the arrival of the Roman commiſſioners in Peloponneſus, Lycortas, at that time prætor, ſummoned the general aſſembly to examine the affair of the Lacedæmonians, that he might be ready to anſwer the queſtions which the commiſſioners ſhould aſk him, and at the ſame time know how his own countrymen ſtood affected. He repreſented to them ſuch things as they might fear from the Romans, who ſeemed to favour the intereſt of Lacedæmon more than that of Achaia ; he expatiated chiefly on the ingratitude of Areus and Alcibiades, who, though they owed their return into their own country to the Achæans, had yet been ſo baſe as to ſpeak in the ſenate againſt them, as if they had drove them from their country. He ended his ſpeech with with theſe words: "But after all they are our ſubjects, "and it is rebellion in them to bring a proceſs againſt their "maſters. What puniſhment then have they deſerved?" At theſe words loud cries were heard from all parts of the aſſembly, deſiring the prætor to put the affair to the vote, and, nothing being liſtened to but paſſion, a decree paſſed, condemning Areus, Alcibiades, and all who attended them in their embaſſy, to be put to death. But in the mean time the Roman commiſſioners arrived, and the ſcene was changed. The aſſembly of the Achæans was then ſitting at Clitor, a little city of Arcadia, and as ſoon as Appius appeared there he took the higheſt place, and acted rather as a judge than a private deputy. The harangue with which he began diſcovered his intentions, and made the Achæans fear the worſt. He told them, that the ſenate had been ſtrongly affected with the complaints of the Lacedæmonians, and could not but diſapprove of all the ſteps that had been taken on that occaſion. He inveighed againſt the perfidiouſneſs and cruelty of thoſe who had maſſacred the envoys from Lacedæmon, a city venerable for its antiquity, and exclaimed againſt the abolition of the laws of Lycurgus, which had been ſo much admired by all the nations in the world. Lycortas the prætor, who was a friend to Philopœmen on whom the accuſation fell, undertook to defend the common cauſe of the republic and the conduct of a great man whom he loved. His ſpeech, for which we refer our readers to Livy [z], was very appoſite and well becoming the head of a nation. But Appius was little affected with it; without deſcending to particulars, or taking any notice of the arguments Lycortas had produced to juſtify their conduct, he defired them to reſtore to Lacedæmon her antient rights and privileges voluntarily, leſt Rome ſhould force them to it. Theſe words drew ſighs from the whole aſſembly; but fear had got the better of their reſentment. They deſired the commiſſioners to do what they thought fit, but not oblige the Achæans to break their oath, by annulling themſelves the decree which they had ſwore to obſerve. This ſubmiſſion appeaſed the anger of Appius, who contented himſelf at preſent with only repealing the ſentence that was juſt before pronounced againſt Areus and Alcibiades. With this act of power and authority they put an end to the ſeſſions, and leaving Greece returned to Italy [a].

[y] Polyb. ibid. c. 42. Liv. l. xxxix. c. 33.

(W) Philopœmen ordered thoſe ſlaves, who had been ſett free by the tyrants, to be ſought out and ſold ; and with the money ariſing from the ſale he rebuilt a portico, which the Lacedæmonians had deſtroyed at Megalopolis his native city.

The Romans eſpouſe the cauſe of the Lacedæmonians.

THE

[z] Liv. l. xxxix. c. 35——37. [a] Liv. ibid.

THE commiſſioners having made their report in the ſenate, it was decreed; that thoſe perſons who had been condemned by the Achæans ſhould be recalled and reſtored; that all ſentences pronounced in the aſſembly of Achaia againſt Lacedæmon ſhould be repealed; and laſtly, that for the future the Lacedæmonians ſhould be deemed members of the Achæan body and treated accordingly. Pauſanias adds an article that is not mentioned by Livy, viz. that the walls which had been demoliſhed ſhould be rebuilt [b]. Q. Marcius was appointed to go into Greece, and ſee this ſentence executed; which he did accordingly, obliging both parties to accept and ſign the decree.

The city of Meſſene withdraws itſelf from the Achæan league.

BUT this ſtorm was ſcarce appeaſed, when a new one aroſe. The city of Meſſene had been a member of the Achæan body ever ſince the war of the confederates, as we have related above. But one Dinocrates, who had a particular enmity to Philopœmen, drew it off from the league, and was arming the Meſſenians, his conntrymen, in order to defend the city againſt Philopœmen, who was then prætor the eighth time. The brave Achæan no ſooner heard of the revolt, but he made what haſte he could to ſeize the city of Corone (X), before the rebel had made himſelf maſter of it. But as he was ſick and actually kept his bed with a fever when the firſt news was brought him of the diſturbances at Meſſene, Dinocrates got to Corone before him. Then the Achæan general aſſembling the Megalopolitan youth, who had offered to follow him as voluntiers, and making a counter-march, advanced towards Meſſene with a deſign to fall upon the revolters, while Dinocrates was buſy at Corone. But on his march he met with Dinocrates, attacked him, and put him to flight at the firſt onſet. Philopœmen on this occaſion forgot his ſickneſs and the fatigues of the day before; for he had marched from Argos to Megalopolis, which was above ſixty miles, in twelve hours. While the Megalopolitans were purſuing the rebels, a body of above five hundred men, Philopœmen marches againſt the rebels.

[b] Paus. in Achaic. p. 414.

(X) Coron or Corone was a city of Meſſenia, and is ſtill in being in the province of Belvedere, and known by the ſame name. Plutarch (9) inſtead of Corone puts Colonis, or Colone, which was alſo a city in the territory of Meſſene, as appears from Ptolemy.

(9) Plutarch. in Philip.

men, whom Dinocrates had had the precaution to leave in the open country about Meſſene to defend it, came and joined him. The Meſſenians, being encouraged by this reinforcement, faced about and renewed the action. The Megalopolitans, though led on by Philopœmen and Lycortas, were too weak to make head againſt ſuch a body of freſh men; Philopœmen therefore made it his chief buſineſs to retire in good order, which branch of the military art he underſtood better than any general of his age. To this end he marched into rough and narrow ways, whither the enemy could not without danger follow him; he placed Lycortas and the Megalopolitans in the van, and brought up the rear himſelf, facing about from time to time and keeping the enemy at ſome diſtance. As his troops retreated with too great precipitation, he was left quite alone in a defile and ſurrounded by the enemy. However, they durſt not even then attack him, but keeping at a diſtance drove him with ſhowers of arrows into a narrow place, where he could not turn his horſe. Yet ſtill he ſupported himſelf, though quite worn out with ſickneſs, the fatigues of his march, and old age, being then in the ſeventieth year. He ſpurred on his horſe croſs the rocks, and was very near rejoining the main body of his ſmall army, when his horſe ſtumbled and threw him. By the fall he received a deep wound on the head and lay ſenſeleſs, till the enemies thinking him dead began to ſtrip him. He then opened his eyes and ſeemed to revive, when Dinocrates, who never before had dared to look him in the face, ordered his hands to be tied behind his back, and in that condition carried him to Meſſene. When the Meſſenians received the news of this victory, and heard that Philopœmen was taken priſoner, they all ran to the gates of the city to ſee what they could no otherwiſe believe. Great was the joy of the rebel city, when the news was confirmed by the relation of thoſe very Meſſenians who had taken him. But upon the ſight of the hero of Greece, reduced to captivity, more by an accident than any want of valour, moſt of the ſpectators were ſo much touched with compaſſion, that they could not refrain from tears; they remembered the exploits of this great man, under whom many of them had fought; they remembered the favours they had received at his hands, and how they had been by his means delivered from the oppreſſions of the tyrant Nabis. As many had not been able to ſee him by reaſon of the croud, they

But is defeated.

Philopœmen taken priſoner.

they deſired he might be carried to the theatre and there ſhewn to the multitude. But the magiſtrates, fearing leſt the eſteem and love which the Meſſenians had formerly ſhewn him ſhould revive, did not ſuffer the illuſtrious priſoner to be long exhibited in this manner. They hurried him away on a ſudden to a vault called the treaſury, without doubt, becauſe the public money was formerly kept there. This was a ſubterraneous place, whither neither light nor air entered from without, and was ſtopped by a large ſtone raiſed up and let down by a crane. In this cavern Philopœmen wounded, ſick, and fatigued, ſpent a miſerable night. Early in the morning the ſenate and people met. The latter were for getting favourable terms in exchange for their priſoner, and ſending him back to his own country. But the ſenators, who had been the authors of the revolt, and conſequently were afraid they ſhould find in him an implacable enemy, agreed to put him to death. And accordingly without delay ſent the executioner into the vault, with orders to force the priſoner to drink a doſe of poiſon. The moment the illuſtrious Megalopolitan ſaw him carrying a cup in his hand, he gueſſed what he was bringing him, and raiſing himſelf up with great difficulty, for he was very weak, he aſked the executioner with great tranquillity, Philopœmen put to death by the Meſſenians. Year of the flood 2820. Before Chriſt 183.

"Whether Lycortas and the Megalopolitan youth had "got into a place of ſafety. Not one of them is killed, "anſwered the executioner, they have all made their eſ-"cape. That is enough, replied Philopœmen, I die "content". He then took the cup of poiſon with great chearfulneſs, and drank the fatal potion with joy. Thus died one of the greateſt heroes that Greece or any other country ever produced. He was no ways inferior in valour, military knowledge, and virtue, to any of the boaſted heroes of Rome. Had Achaia been nearer to an equality with Rome, he would have preſerved his country from the yoke which the Roman republic forced it to bear. Both the Greek and Roman writers put him upon the level with Hannibal and Scipio, who were his contemporaries and happened to die the ſame year. They all allow him to have been not only one of the greateſt commanders, but one of the greatſt ſtateſmen, of his age. To his valour and prudence Achaia owed all her glory, which upon his death began to decline, there being none after him in that republic able to oppoſe her enemies, with the like ſteadineſs and prudence; whence Philopœmen

was

was called the laſt of the Greeks, as Brutus was afterwards ſtiled the laſt of the Romans [c].

WHEN the news of his death was ſpread among the cities of the Achæan league, the rage of the people againſt his aſſaſſins was as great as their grief for the loſs of ſo great a man. The general aſſembly was immediately convened at Megalopolis, and Lycortas, at that time the moſt famous general in Achaia, put in the room of the deceaſed. The new general without loſs of time entered the Meſſenian territory at the head of an army which was ſoon raiſed, all the young men that were fit to bear arms, ſhewing a great eagerneſs to revenge the death of a man to whom their country owed all its ſplendor. Lycortas had been his particular friend, and therefore was determined at all events to bring the authors of his death to condign puniſhment. Thus, both the general and ſoldiery breathing nothing but revenge, they advanced to the very walls of Meſſene, after having laid waſte the whole territory, and ſummoned the rebellious city to ſurrender. The people, in ſpite of the prætor and ſenate, opened the gates to the Achæan troops, and put them in poſſeſſion both of the city and caſtle. This ſubmiſſive behaviour aſſwaged the wrath of Lycortas, who did not think it adviſeable to treat the rebels as their furious revolt ſeemed to deſerve. He only inſiſted upon their delivering up the ring-leaders of the rebellion, and ſuch as were any ways concerned in the death of Philopœmen. They readily complied with his requeſt, and the aſſaſſins loaded with irons were brought before him; but Dinocrates, to prevent a more cruel death, laid violent hands on himſelf; the reſt were afterwards carried to Megalopolis, in order to be ſacrificed at the tomb of the deceaſed hero [d].

Meſſene ſurrenders to the Achæans.

AND now nothing remained, but to pay the funeral honours to the body of Philopœmen, which had been left unburied in the bottom of a dungeon. It was taken from thence with great pomp, burnt according to cuſtom on a funeral pile, and his aſhes depoſited in an urn adorned with feſtoons and fillets. Lycortas, being now to leave the conquered city, did not diſband his troops and ſend them to their reſpective homes as uſual. They all marched out of the city in good order, as it were in funeral triumph. The infantry marched firſt crowned with lawrel to ſhew their victory, but ſheding Philopœmen's aſhes carried in great pomp to Megalopolis.

[c] Liv. l. xxxix. c. 48. Plut. in Philop. p. 366, 368. Polyb. in legat. c. 52, 53.

[d] Liv. Plut. Polyb, ubi ſupra.

ſhedding floods of tears for the deceaſed hero. Next came the urn carried by Polybius the hiſtorian, ſon of Lycortas, ſurrounded by the prime nobility of Achaia, and the Meſſenian priſoners bound in chains. The urn was followed by the cavalry in their richeſt apparel and capariſons. All the inhabitants of the neighbouring towns and villages flocked to meet the ſolemn proceſſion; but it was viſible in every one's countenance, that their joy for the victory was damped with real grief on this mournful occaſion. In this manner they advanced towards Megalopolis, Philopœmen's native city, and arriving there paid him the laſt honours, with the utmoſt pomp and magnificence. The Meſſenian captives were ſtoned at his tomb, and each city of Achaia gave ſome ſignal proof of the eſteem they had for him while alive, and of the real grief they felt for the loſs of ſo great a hero. Statues were erected to his memory in moſt cities of Greece with noble inſcriptions. The magiſtrates of Megalopolis paſſed a decree, ordering a bull to be yearly ſacrificed at his tomb; during which ſacrifice a panegyric was pronounced, and a company of young children ſung hymns in his praiſe [e] (Y).

When news was brought to Rome, that the Achæans had reſtored the city of Meſſene to the league, their embaſſadors there were addreſſed in quite different terms from thoſe which had been uſed before. The ſenate told them, that they had been careful not to ſuffer either arms or proviſions to be carried from Italy to Meſſene. This plainly ſhews the inſincerity of the Romans, and the little regard they had to truth in their tranſactions with other nations. For when the Achæans demanded the ſuccours which they were obliged to furniſh them according to the treaty, and deſired, at leaſt, that they would not ſuffer arms or proviſions to be tranſported out of Italy to Meſſene, it was anſwered, [e] Idem, ibid.

(Y) Several years after when Corinth was taken and deſtroyed by Mummius, a Roman brought articles of impeachment againſt Philopœmen, in order to have the ſtatues and monuments, erected all over Greece to the memory of this great man, thrown down and aboliſhed. He accuſed him of having been an enemy to the Romans, and ſhewn on all occaſions his hatred to the republic. The cauſe was heard in council before Mummius, and the charge refuted with great eloquence and ſolidity by Polybius.

ſwered, that, when any city broke off from the Achæan league, the ſenate did not think themſelves obliged to enter into thoſe diſputes, nor concern themſelves with the claims and pretenſions which each city might have. This was giving, as it were, the ſignal to all the cities engaged in the Achæan league to take up arms, and ſeparate as they pleaſed from the alliance. But now they endeavour to perſuade the Achæans that they had prohibited the ſubjects of the republic from lending any kind of aſſiſtance to the Meſſenian rebels, and make a merit with them of what they had not done. The Achæans at this time were maſters of all Peloponneſus, Philip king of Macedon was preparing a-new for war, the Ætolians were diſguſted with Rome and Antiochus ready to paſs over into Greece. No wonder then, that Rome was very cautious of giving any umbrage to the league in ſo critical a juncture.

We have obſerved above, that the Roman ſenate had decreed, among many other articles, that Sparta ſhould be admitted into the Achæan league, and that Marcius had been ſent into Greece to ſee this decree put in execution. However, the Achæan embaſſadors on their return from Rome acquainted the aſſembly, that the Lacedæmonian exiles, who had behaved with great ingratitude towards them, were not included in that decree, and conſequently might be driven a-new from the city without diſobliging the ſenate. Upon their report the exiles were again ordered to depart the city, notwithſtanding the ſtrong oppoſition made by Diophanes, who undertook to defend their cauſe. Being thus reduced to their former ſtate of miſery, they ſent embaſſadors to Rome imploring the protection of the ſenate. The ſenators were touched with their complaints, and wrote letters to the council of Achaia, deſiring them to give the Lacedæmonian exiles leave to ſettle again in their native country. Theſe letters were delivered to the exiles, and by them on their return to the council of Achaia, which returned no other anſwer, than that the matter ſhould be conſidered after the arrival of the Achæan embaſſadors from Rome. Not long after the embaſſadors returned, and declared before the council, that the ſenate had wrote in favour of the exiles, not out of any regard to them, but to redeem themſelves from their importunities [f].

The Lacedæmonian exiles recur to the Romans.

After the embaſſadors had been heard, Lycortas was of opinion, that no notice ſhould be taken of the letters which the [f] Polyb. in Legat. c. 54.

the ſenate had wrote; but Hyperbates, who was then prætor, and Callicrates were of a different opinion. Lycortas, however, carried it, and it was reſolved, that embaſſadors ſhould be ſent to acquaint the Roman ſenate with the reaſons which had moved them to adhere to their former reſolutions, notwithſtanding their recommendation. Callicrates, Lyſiades, and Aratus, were appointed embaſſadors, and inſtructions given them agreeable to the deliberations that had been made. When they arrived at Rome, Callicrates acted in direct oppoſition to his orders; for being introduced to the ſenate, he exhorted them to exert their authority over his ſtubborn countrymen, telling them, that if the Greeks paid no regard either to their letters or decrees, they ought to blame themſelves for it, ſuch a neglect being entirely owing to their lenity and indolence. "In our commonwealth," ſaid he, "there are two parties, one of which maintains, "that an implicit obedience ſhould be paid to all your orders; the other party pretends, that the laws of the country ſhould prevail over your will; and this ſuits beſt with "the genius of the Achæans, and has a great influence over "the populace. Hence ſuch as blindly comply with your "ordinances are hated by the people, while thoſe who oppoſe them are honoured and applauded. We ſee at this "preſent time the firſt employments of our republic filled "by men, whoſe only merit conſiſts in a pretended zeal "for the laws of their country, in contradiction to the "expreſs orders of this auguſt aſſembly. If you continue "to ſhew ſuch an indifference on this head, all the chief "men will certainly oppoſe you, this being a ſure way to "preferment. But if you ſhew favour to thoſe only who "eſpouſe your intereſt, the leading men in all the repub"lics of Greece will declare for you, and the populace "ſoon follow their example. What I have ſaid is plainly "confirmed by the preſent conduct of my countrymen. "How long is it ſince you deſired them to recal the Lace"dæmonian exiles? Nevertheleſs they are ſo far from com"plying with your requeſt, that they have bound them"ſelves by oath never to reſtore them [g]." Thus the Greeks began to forge their own chains, and ambitious men proſtitute to their private intereſt that liberty which their anceſtors had purchaſed and maintained at the expence of their lives. Callicrates was ſo tranſported with ambition, that that he choſe rather to betray and ruin his country, than ſuffer any other to have more authority in it than himſelf.

Callicrates betrays his country, to ingratiate himſelf with the Romans

[g] Polyb. in Legat. c. 58.

A ſpeech ſo well calculated to favour the intereſt of Rome could not but he very agreeable to the ſenate. As Callicrates had treacherouſly pointed out the methods by which they might eaſily weaken and cruſh the Greek republics, it was concluded, that they ſhould exert themſelves in heaping favours upon ſuch as maintained the authority of Rome, and humbling thoſe who preſumed to oppoſe it. Our hiſtorian obſerves, that this was the firſt time the fatal reſolution was taken of depreciating thoſe, who in their reſpective countries, had the moſt noble way of thinking, and raiſing ſuch as declared right or wrong for the Romans; a reſolution which in all countries leſſened the number of the true friends of liberty. Henceforth it was a conſtant maxim of the Roman policy, to encreaſe the power and authority of ſuch as favoured their ambitious views, in defiance of the laws and conſtitutions of their reſpective countries, and oppreſs by all poſſible methods thoſe who were ſincere friends to the liberty which they had received from their anceſtors. This ſingle maxim is ſufficient to give us a true idea of the pretended equity and moderation which the Romans diſcovered on ſome occaſions.

The Achæans commanded to reſtore the Lacedæmonian exiles.

FROM this period Rome began to treat the Achæans in a quite different manner from what ſhe had done in former times. Peremptory orders were ſent them to reſtore the Lacedæmonian exiles, and pay a blind obedience to the decrees of the ſenate. Letters were at the ſame time directed to the Ætolians, Bœotians, Acarnanians, and other free ſtates of Greece, enjoining them to ſee the orders of the ſenate put in execution, and exhorting them to employ in their reſpective commonwealths men only of ſuch exalted ſentiments as Callicrates. Thus the Romans requited the eminent ſervices which the Achæans had done them in their wars with Philip and Antiochus, and the inviolable fidelity, with which they had adhered to them, when they were deſpiſed by the other ſtates of Greece(Z). Callicrates on his return

(Z) Polybius aſcribes this violent proceeding of the Romans to the compaſſion which the Spartan exiles raiſed in the breaſts of the ſenators. The Romans, ſays he, are eaſily moved to pity by the return to Peloponnesus, spread so artfully the terror of the Roman name, and intimidated the people to such a degree, that he was elected prætor; in which employment he restored the Lacedæmonian and Messenian exiles, and omitted nothing that could any ways oblige his patrons the Romans.

By these violent methods Rome got numbers of flatterers, but lost many of her best friends; and on the other side Perses, who had succeeded Philip in the kingdom of Macedon, spared no pains to win over to his party such as were dissatisfied with the Romans. That prince, being determined to shake off the yoke which the Romans had laid on him, made it his whole business to draw off the Greek cities and nations from their alliance with Rome. To this end, thinking his presence necessary among nations, who would perhaps sooner hearken to a neighbouring king than a distant republic, he advanced towards Delphos under pretence of discharging a vow, but in reality to make alliances in Greece. With this view he crossed mount Oeta, and surprized the Greeks with his sudden appearance among them. The terror spread into Asia, and alarmed Eumenes in Pergamus. But Perses after consulting the oracle returned into his own kingdom, passing through Phthiotis and Thessaly, without committing any hostilities in his march. His father had formerly been guilty of great cruelties in all those countries, and therefore the son not only took care to commit no violence on his march, but sent deputies to all the free states, or circular letters, remonstrating, that they ought not to continue the hatred, they might have conceived against the father, to the son who courted their friendship [h].

Perses endeavours to gain over the Achæans. Year of the flood 2825. Before Christ 178.

The Macedonian's chief attention was to gain over the Achæan republic, which had carried its hatred so far against the Macedonians, that they were not suffered upon any pretence to enter Achaia. It was not only hatred, but policy, that had induced them to make such a decree. For though Philip the complaints of the miserable, and think it their duty to relieve all who fly to them for protection. And this it was that inclined them to espouse the cause of the Lacedæmonian exiles. But we must remember, that this (in other respects impartial) historian wrote this in Rome, and under the eyes of the Romans, after they were absolute lords of Greece (10).

[h] Liv. l. xli. c. 12.

(10) Polyb. legat. c. 58.

Philip had greatly diſobliged them, eſpecially by putting the two Aratus's to death, yet he had proved in many other reſpects very beneficent to them; whence they were with much ado prevailed upon to forſake him; and even after they had entered into an alliance with the Romans, ſome of their leading men ſtill favoured their antient ally. Wherefore it was thought neceſſary, for the preſervation of concord among themſelves, to uſe great circumſpection, leſt by his agents he ſhould foment diviſions in the ſtate. Beſides, by hearkening to his meſſages they might give jealouſy to their new allies. On theſe conſiderations the general aſſembly of Achaia had enacted a decree, forbidding any Macedonian, on what pretence ſoever, to enter into Achaia, on pain of being treated as an enemy to the ſtate. This decree cut off all intercourſe and means of reconciliation with the Macedonians, and thereby quaſhed at once the Macedonian faction. But at the ſame time it proved very prejudicial both to the Achæans and Macedonians; for the ſlaves on both ſides uſed to fly to the enemies of their maſters, where they found a ſure aſylum, knowing they ſhould not be followed or claimed after that general prohibition. However, Perſes made the firſt ſtep towards a reconciliation, by ſending back to the Achæans ſuch of their ſlaves as had taken ſanctuary in his dominions. With this acceptable preſent he ent an obliging letter, exhorting them to take effectual methods for preventing their ſlaves from finding for the future refuge in his dominions. This was courting their friendſhip, and tacitly demanding the re-eſtabliſhment of their antient commerce. One Xenarchus, who was then prætor of Achaia, read the king's letter in a full aſſembly; it was heard with great applauſe, eſpecially by thoſe who had received their ſlaves, and moſt of the leading men were for annulling the decree forbidding all commerce with Macedon. But Callicrates repreſented to them the bad conſequences of repealing the decree in ſo critical a juncture; he told them, that the Romans deſigned to make war upon Perſes, that Perſes had nothing elſe in view by ſending back their ſlaves than to involve them and all Greece in this war, and that to enter into the leaſt engagement with Perſes was to renounce their alliance with Rome, and draw all the weſt upon them. He therefore exhorted them, as they tendered the welfare of their country, to refuſe the dangerous preſents, live as utter ſtrangers to Macedon, and confirm the decree forbidding all manner of commerce with her.

ARCON Xenarchus's brother ſpoke after Callicrates, and endeavoured to prove, that the fear of an imminent war was without foundation, ſince Perſes had renewed his alliance with the Romans, was honoured by them with the title of friend and ally, and had lately entertained their embaſſadors with great demonſtrations of kindneſs; why then might not the Achæans, as well as the Epirots, Ætolians, Theſſalians, and the other nations of Greece, reap the advantages of his neighbourhood? Why might not the Achæans, like the other free ſtates, ceaſe to be enemies to Perſes, without ceaſing to be friends to Rome? He concluded, that it would be time enough to declare againſt the Macedonians when they were come to an open rupture with Rome; but till then they had no reaſon to be more zealous for their friends, than their friends were for themſelves [i].

ARCON's diſcourſe would have determined the aſſembly to comply with the requeſt of Perſes, had not Callicrates obſerved, that the king had not vouchſafed to treat with them otherwiſe than by a ſhort letter. This want of reſpect, as Callicrates ſtiled it, being artfully repreſented, made the aſſembly poſtpone the determination, and refuſe for the preſent the king's offer. As ſoon as Perſes was acquainted with what had paſſed at the diet, he ſent embaſſadors to make the ſame offers. But the advocates of Rome found means to render all their negotiations fruitleſs [k].

The Achæans declare for the Romans. Year of the flood 2834. Before Chriſt 169.

SOME years after, a war breaking out between the Romans and Perſes, great diviſions aroſe in all the cities and free ſtates of Greece, ſome favouring the Macedonians, and others adhering to the Romans. The aſſembly of Achaia was not exempt from theſe diſturbances; but Arcon wiſely prevented the ill conſequences that might attend them, by engaging all the chiefs of Achaia to eſpouſe the cauſe of the Romans. Arcon was not, as we have ſeen above, greatly inclined to the Romans, but rather favoured in his heart the Macedonian faction; however, as he foreſaw that Rome would at laſt prevail, he was no ſooner choſen prætor, but he got the diet to paſs a decree, impowering him to raiſe what forces he pleaſed and march with them to join the Romans. In the ſame aſſembly it was reſolved, that embaſſadors ſhould be ſent to Marcius the Roman conſul, who had already penetrated into Theſſaly, to acquaint him with the

[i] Liv. ubi ſupra. c. 27. [k] Liv. ibid. c. 28.

the reſolution of the republic, and to know, when, and where, the Achæan army ſhould join him. Polybius the hiſtorian being named for this embaſſy, he immediately ſet out for the Roman camp, in order to ſuppreſs the reports that were ſpread, as if Achaia intended to aſſiſt the Macedonians. When he arrived he was received by the conſul with great demonſtrations of kindneſs. The good will of ſo powerful a nation, at a time when ſo many others were wavering in their fidelity, could not but be acceptable to him. He therefore thanked them in the kindeſt terms, and told them, that they might ſpare themſelves the trouble and expence of marching their troops to join him, ſince in the preſent poſture of affairs he did not want any foreign ſuccours. With this anſwer Polybius ſent back his collegues, but remained himſelf in the Roman camp. In the mean time the Achæans acquainted Polybius, that Appius, who commanded the Roman troops in Epirus, had demanded of their republic five thouſand men, which body they were ready to ſend into Epirus, if the conſul approved of it. But Marcius was ſo far from conſenting that any ſuccours ſhould be ſent to Appius, that he immediately diſpatched Polybius home with orders not to ſuffer any troops to be ſent to Appius, nor his republic to be put to ſuch uſeleſs expences. It is difficult, ſays our hiſtorian, to diſcover the real motives that induced Marcius to act in this manner. Was he for ſaving the Achæans the trouble and charges of ſo long a march? or did he intend to put it out of Appius's power to undertake any thing, ſince he had not heen able to undertake any thing himſelf? Whatever was his motive, Polybius readily complied with the inclinations of the conſul, and returned home. But when the matter was debated in the council of Achaia, difficulties were ſtarted by Polybius's friends and thoſe of his party. For as he was ſure to incur the diſpleaſure of the conſul, if he did not act agreeable to his charge; ſo on the other hand orders given him by word of mouth, and in private, did not ſeem ſufficient to warrant the conduct of the council in refuſing ſuccours to Appius, who really wanted them. In this caſe therefore they had recourſe to a decree which had been lately publiſhed, in all the cities of Greece, by two commiſſioners ſent for that purpoſe from Rome. The purport of this decree was, to forbid the Roman generals to exact any thing of the nations in confederacy with Rome without an expreſs order from the ſenate, and prohibiting the allies to ſubmit to any ex-action or even demands of the conſuls, prætors, tribunes, &c. without ſuch an order. The tyranny, which the commanders of the Roman fleets and armies exerciſed over their moſt faithful allies, gave occaſion to this decree. For want of an order from the ſenate, the meſſenger ſent by Appius was diſmiſſed without the ſuccours he demanded. Thus Polybius, made his court to the conſul, and at the ſame time conſulted the intereſt of his country [1].

THE enſuing year Paulus Æmilius, who ſucceeded Marcius in the command of the army in Macedon, being informed, that Perſes was drawing together a mighty army with a deſign to come to a deciſive battle, ſent to ſollicit ſuccours from the allies, eſpecially the Achæans, who upon the firſt ſummons ſent him what troops he wanted, under the conduct of the moſt experienced commanders they had. Theſe diſtinguiſhed themſelves in a very particular manner at the famous battle of Pydna, which put an end to the Macedonian war, Perſes being entirely defeated, and ſoon after reduced to ſuch ſtreights, that he was obliged to deliver up himſelf and all his children to the conquerors. And now the Romans, having by this victory triumphed over their enemies in the eaſt, began to treat their friends in a quite different manner from what they had uſed while they ſtood in need of their aſſiſtance. Ten commiſſioners were appointed to ſettle the affairs of Macedon and inſpect thoſe of Greece, that is to proſecute and puniſh, without any regard to juſtice and equity, all thoſe who during the war had betrayed any inclination to the Macedonians. Theſe haughty judges ſummoned all the heads of the Greek nations to appear before their tribunal at Amphipolis, in order to compoſe their differences, as they gave out, and reſtore Greece to its antient tranquillity. The Ætolians appeared firſt, in mourning habits and making great lamentations. The ſubject of their complaints was, that two members of their aſſembly, Lyſiſchus and Tiſippus, whom the protection of the Romans, to whoſe intereſt they were devoted, rendered very powerful in Ætolia, had ſurrounded the ſenate with ſoldiers lent them by Bœbius, who commanded in that country for the Romans, and put to death five hundred an fifty of the ſenators for no other crime, but becauſe they were thought to favour Perſes. The commiſſioners after hearing their complaints confined their enquiries to this point alone, whether thoſe who had been thus maſſacred were for the

The haughty behaviour of the Romans after the defeat of Perſes.

Romans

[1] Liv. ibid. Polyb. legat. c. 77.

Romans or Perſes, and having found that they had ſpoke in the ſenate for Perſes, the council paſſed a decree, by which the murderers were acquitted, and thoſe who had been put to death declared to have ſuffered juſtly. Bœbius alone was blamed, for employing the Roman ſoldiers in an execution whic had no relation to military affairs [m].

THIS ſentence ſpread great terror among thoſe who had ſhewn any affection for Perſes, and encreaſed beyond meaſure the pride and inſolence of the partiſans of Rome. In each city the leading men were divided into three factions. The firſt, and without doubt the moſt numerous, adhered to the Macedonians; the ſecond was devoted to the Romans, and the third in oppoſition to the other two were neither for the Macedonians nor the Romans. The latter, whoſe party was leaſt numerous, as it conſiſted only of prudent men, were afraid, that, whatever party ſhould prevail, their liberties might be in danger, and their concern was to preſerve their country both from the Macedonian and Roman tyranny. Theſe were in great eſteem and beloved in their reſpective cities, and had acted prudently in all the meaſures they had taken. But this was not ſufficient, as we ſhall ſee, to ſcreen them from the vengeance of the Romans. The commiſſioners firſt wreaked their anger on thoſe who had favoured Perſes, for the emiſſaries of Rome flocked to Amphipolis from all the countries of Greece to accuſe them before the council. Theſe treacherous men informed the commiſſioners, that, beſides thoſe who had openly eſpouſed the cauſe of Perſes, there were many others, who were no leſs averſe from the Romans in their hearts; adding, that they would never have their authority quietly ſettled in Greece, till they had utterly deſtroyed both the favourers of Perſes and thoſe who had affected to ſtand neuter, and not to fall in with either party. The ten commiſſioners entirely approved what the informers advanced, and made it the rule of their conduct to quaſh in all the Greek cities not only the Macedonian, but the neutral party, and confer honours on thoſe only who preferred the intereſt of Rome to all other regards whatſoever. What juſtice could be expected from an aſſembly that was determined to treat all thoſe as criminals who were not of the Roman party, and confer employments on ſuch only as declared themſelves their accuſers and enemies? We leave the reader to judge from hence of the ſo much boaſted equity of the Romans.

Year of the flood 2836. Before Chriſt 167.

[m] Liv. l. xlv. c. 28, 32.

They were juſt and honeſt when they found their account in juſtice and honeſty, but ever ready to ſacrifice both to their boundleſs ambition.

THE moſt ſanguine of theſe informers were Callicrates and Andronidas, both Achæans, and greatly attached to the Roman party. They laid claim to the chief employments of their republic, or were willing to maintain themſelves in them with the aſſiſtance of the Romans. With this view they informed againſt all thoſe among their countrymen who were in a condition to diſpute the higheſt poſts with them; and their accuſations turned upon this, that their rivals had been friends and partiſans of Perſes before his overthrow. Beſides the Achæans, Callicrates accuſed a great many others, and gave in a long liſt of ſuch as had either declared for the Macedonian, or ſtood up for the defence of their own rights and priviledges in Acarnania, Epirus, and Bœotia. All theſe were ordered by Paulus Æmilius to follow him to Rome, and there give an account of their conduct. But as to the Achæans, the commiſſioners thought it adviſeable to judge them in their own country, and to ſend two of the chief members of the council into Achaia to try them there; and accordingly C. Claudius and Cn. Domitius Ænobarbus were named and ſet out for Achaia. Three reaſons induced them to act in this manner: the firſt was, becauſe they apprehended, that the Achæans, who were very powerful and no leſs jealous of their liberty, would not obey their orders ſhould they be commanded to juſtify themſelves at Rome; the ſecond, becauſe they had not found any of their letters among Perſes's papers; and the third, becauſe it was neceſſary to protect Callicrates and the other informers againſt the inſults of their countrymen [n].

Unwarrantable proceedings of the Romans.

ONE of the two commiſſioners ſent into Achaia, Pauſanias does not ſay which, a man of a moſt vile character, complained in the aſſembly of the Achæans, that many of the chief men of the league had aſſiſted Perſes againſt the Romans, and therefore deſired that all thoſe ſhould be condemned to die, whom he ſhould name after ſentence given. "After ſentence given," cried out the whole aſſembly, "What juſtice is that? Name them firſt, and "let them anſwer for themſelves; which if they cannot do [n] Juſtin. l. xxxiv. c. 1. Pauſan. in Achaic. p. 416.

" do we engage to condemn them. Since you promiſe " to condemn them, replied the haughty Roman with an " aſſuming air, all your prætors, all who have bore any " office in your republic, or commanded your armies, are " guilty of this crime ". At theſe words Xenon, a perſon of great credit, and highly reſpected by the whole league, ſpoke to this effect : " I have commanded the " army, and have had the honour to have been the chief " magiſtrate of the league ; I proteſt I have never done " any thing contrary to the intereſt of Rome ; and if " any one can charge me with that crime, as it is now " ſtiled, let him appear ; I am ready to clear myſelf, ei- " ther in the aſſembly of the Achæans, or before the Ro- " man ſenate". The Roman took hold of this expreſſion, and ſaid, that ſince Xenon had named the ſenate, he and the reſt could not appeal to a more impartial judge ; then he began to name all thoſe who had been accuſed by Callicrates, as more in the Macedonian than the Roman intereſt, ordering them to appear and plead their cauſe before the ſenate. They were above a thouſand, all men of diſtinguiſhed merit, and who had nothing ſo much at heart as the welfare of their country ; and this was the only crime that could be laid to their charge. This ſentence was a mortal wound to the liberty of Achaia. That unhappy republic was deprived at once of all thoſe who had ſhewn any zeal for the preſervation of her liberty. Such tyrannical proceedings had been unknown there even under Philip and his ſon Alexander ; for neither of theſe princes ever thought of cauſing thoſe who oppoſed them to be ſent into Macedon, but referred their trials to the council of the Amphictyons their natural judges. Upon the arrival of theſe unhappy men at Rome, they were baniſhed into different towns of Italy, and kept there cloſe priſoners, as if they had been already tried and condemned by the aſſembly of the Achæans. When news of theſe tyrannical proceedings was brought into Achaia, the aſſembly ſent embaſſy after embaſſy to acquaint the ſenate, that their baniſhed countrymen had not been tried at home, but referred for their trial to the Roman ſenate ; they begged, that they would give them a hearing, condemn ſuch as they ſhould find guilty, and allow the others to return home. But the republic was inexorable ; ſhe obſtinately inſiſted upon their having been found guilty in Achaia, and ſent to Rome only to hear what puniſhment ſhe

A thouſand Achæans commanded to appear before the Roman ſenate.

ſhe was pleaſed to inflict upon them. Hereupon the Achæans ſent a ſolemn embaſſy to the ſenate, to proteſt that the pretended guilty perſons had never been tried, or even heard, by their aſſembly. Euratas, who was at the head of this embaſſy, being introduced to the ſenate, declared the orders he had received, earneſtly entreating the ſenate in the name of his republic, that they would but once hear the perſons accuſed, and not ſuffer them to periſh without being condemned. "It were to be "wiſhed, ſaid he, that the Roman ſenate, that auguſt "venerable aſſembly which has never been known to "ſwerve in its deciſions from the ſtricteſt rules of equity, "would take the cauſe of theſe unhappy men into their "own hands; but if affairs of greater importance do not "allow them leiſure to examine the matter themſelves, "let them refer it to the aſſembly of the Achæans, who "are ready to puniſh with the utmoſt rigour ſuch as they "ſhall find guilty of any crime that may he laid to their "charge." As this demand was very equitable, the ſenate was greatly puzzled what to anſwer. They did not think it adviſeable to try the cauſe, as knowing that the accuſation was groundleſs. On the other hand, to diſmiſs the exiles and ſuffer them to return to their own country was to diſoblige their partiſans in Greece, who placed all the hopes of their preferment in the ruin of thoſe who had a better title to favour than themſelves. After ſeveral conſultations, the ſenate for want of a better anſwer returned this, "that they did not think it expe- "dient for the welfare of Achaia that theſe men ſhould "return home." Such tyrannical proceedings cauſed an univerſal conſternation in Achaia, all the inhabitants appeared in mourning habits, and lamented the loſs of their countrymen no otherwiſe than if they had been their dearеſt relations. Callicrates and Andronidas became more than ever the objects of the public hatred. They were never mentioned in the aſſemblies but with horror and deteſtation. Even the children fell upon them in the public ſtreets, calling them traitors and enemies to their country. Nay the Achæans carried their rage ſo far, that when the two informers had one day gone into a public bath at Sicyon, no body would waſh with them, or even after them, till the water was let out and the place purified. This general uneaſineſs made Achaia ſtill the more ſuſpected by the Roman ſenate, who kept the priſoners more cloſely confined than ever. Theſe were the the firſt ſeeds of a war, which we ſhall ſoon ſee break out between Rome and Achaia; the firſt ſparks of that fire which conſumed Corinth [o].

THE Achæans, however, did not give over ſolliciting the ſenate for the releaſe of the exiles. They ſent new deputies to beg their return as a favour, leſt in taking upon them their defence they ſhould ſeem to oppoſe the will of the ſenate. The deputies appeared at Rome in the attire of ſuppliants, and took care not to ſay any thing, in the harangue they made before the ſenate, that could give offence. Their ſpeech was modeſt and extremely reſerved; but the conſcript fathers continued inexorable, declaring, that they would not upon any account whatſoever alter the meaſures they had taken. The Achæans on the other hand would not give over ſolliciting and importuning the ſenate in behalf of their countrymen. They ſent ſeveral embaſſies at different times, and made what intereſt they could among their friends at Rome and elſewhere, to get their petition backed by perſons who were better received than themſelves. But all was to no effect; they could not be prevailed upon even to ſuffer Polybius, who was one of the exiles and kept under cloſe confinement at Rome, to appear before the ſenate and plead the common cauſe. This is the ſo much vaunted equity of the Romans; theſe the civilizers of barbarous nations, the aſſerters of the rights and liberties of mankind.

SEVENTEEN years were already paſt, and the far greater part of the unfortunate exiles dead in their confinement, when the ſenate at laſt was prevailed upon to ſuffer thoſe few who were ſtill alive to return home. Polybius, as we have hinted above, was one of theſe unhappy Achæans; but had been kept at Rome, whither his reputation had reached before him and procured him that diſtinction. During his confinement in that city, his merit, wiſdom, and learning, gained him the love and eſteem of the greateſt men in the ſenate. He was particularly dear to the two ſons of Paulus Æmilius; the eldeſt of theſe had been adopted into the family of the Fabii, and the youngeſt into that of the Scipios. The latter, who afterwards deſtroyed Carthage and Numantia, at the requeſt of his friends ſollicited Cato the cenſor to ſpeak ſpeak in the ſenate in favour of the Achæans, knowing that his opinion would be of great weight with the members of that aſſembly. Cato, out of complaiſance to young Scipio, promiſed to back the petition of the new deputies that were then come from Achaia to intercede for the exiles. When they were admitted to audience, warm debates aroſe, as uſual, among the ſenators, ſome few being for ſending them home, and the others oppoſing it, when Cato roſe up, and with great gravity ſaid, "that to ſee "the Roman ſenate diſpute with great warmth, whether "ſome poor old Greeks ſhould be buried in Italy or in their "own country, would make one think that they had no-"thing at all to do." This pleaſantry, coming from ſo grave a man as Cato, made the ſenators aſhamed of ſo long a conteſt, and determined them at laſt to ſend back the exiles into Peloponneſus. Polybius was for ſupplicating the ſenate, that they might be reinſtated in all the honours and dignities they had enjoyed before their baniſhment; but before he preſented that requeſt to the ſenate, he thonght proper to hear Cato's opinion, who told him ſmiling: "Polybius, you do not imitate the wiſdom of "Ulyſſes. You are for returning into the cave of the "Cyclops for ſome poor tatters you have left there." Accordingly the exiles returned to their own country, but their number was much diminiſhed; for of the thouſand and upwards that came from Achaia, no more than three hundred returned thither. The reſt had periſhed in Italy with hunger and grief, and ſome had ſuffered like criminals for attempting to make their eſcape [p]. Such inhuman proceedings deſerve no other name but that of the moſt wanton and oppreſſive tyranny. The republic of Achaia was not ſubject to, but upon a level with, that of Rome. Thoſe brave Achæans, who were thus barbarouſly treated, had moſt of them ſerved under the Roman ſtandards, and greatly contributed to that very victory, which rendered the conquerors thus haughty and over-bearing.

[o] Liv. l. xlv. c. 31. Pauſan. in Achaic. p. 417. Polyb. legat. 105.

The Achæans after ſeventeen years confinement are ſent home.

As for Polybius, he made no uſe of this permiſſion, but remained in Rome, where that very virtue which had brought him into diſtreſs was not only the means of his relief, but of his exaltation to greater dignities than thoſe he loſt. He attended Scipio Æmilianus in all his military expediexpeditions, and ſignalized himſelf no leſs in the ſervice of Rome, than he had formerly done in that of Achaia.

[p] Pauſan. in Achaic. Plut. in Cat. cenſore. Polyb. in legat. 129, 130.

THE exiles on their return found Achaia rent into different factions, and the minds of the common people entirely eſtranged from the Romans. They only wanted an opportunity to make Rome repent of the rigorous treatment ſhe had ſhewn to the Achæan priſoners. This averſion was artfully fomented by their chief magiſtrates and the leading men in the republic, who were for the moſt part profeſſed enemies to the Romans. Such an univerſal hatred could not be long kept within the bounds of moderation; it ſoon broke out into an open war, which ended in the entire reduction of Achaia and the diſſolution of the Achæan league.

What gave riſe to the war with the Romans.

To trace this war back to its firſt origin: a certain diſpute ariſing between the Athenians and the inhabitants of Oropus (A), the latter had recourſe to the Achæans. Menalcidas, by birth a Lacedæmonian, was then prætor of Achaia; to him the Oropians applied, agreeing to give him ten talents if he prevailed on the diet, in which he preſided, to eſpouſe their cauſe and aſſiſt them with troops. The Lacedæmonian, who preferred his own private advantage to the good of the public, accepted the propoſal, and, in order to gain his point, promiſed to divide the money with Callicrates, if he could by his intereſt extort from the general aſſembly their conſent to ſend troops to the defence of Oropus. Callicrates, allured with this bait, prevailed on the aſſembly to take the city of Oropus under their protection; and accordingly Menalcidas was immediately diſpatched, with a ſtrong body of choſen troops, to make head againſt the Athenians who had already taken the field. But Menalcidas came too late, the Athenians had already plundered Oropus and retired with an immenſe booty; however, the avaricious prætor demanded the ten talents, as if his aſſiſtance had been effectual; but could not prevail on himſelf to divide them with Callicrates: he firſt put him off with fair promiſes, and at laſt told him in plain words, that he would keep the whole ſum to himſelf.

Callicrates,

(A) The antient geographers mention three cities bearing this name; one, called by Ariſtotle Græca, ſtood in the iſland of Eubœa; another, the native city of Seleucus Nicator, belonged to Macedon; the third, which is the city we are now ſpeaking of, ſtood in Bœotia, near the borders of Attica, forty-four miles north of Athens. It is now a village called by the natives Ropo.

Callicrates, who was as revengeful as the other was deceitful, accuſed him, as ſoon as he was out of his office, of having uſed his utmoſt endeavours with the Roman ſenate to withdraw his country from the Achæan league. The proceſs was carried on with ſuch rigour, that Menalcidas would have been ſentenced to death, if he had not by a preſent of three talents prevailed upon Diæus, who ſucceeded him in the prætorſhip, to acquit him in ſpite of all the evidences that were produced againſt him. This drew on Diæus the hatred of all the nation, as if he likewiſe were inclined to the Lacedæmonians. This was a great ſtain on his reputation, which he endeavoured to wipe off by this bold ſtep. He maintained in the general aſſembly, that the Lacedæmonians were ſubject to the Achæan league even in criminal caſes. Rome had decreed the contrary; but this ſcreened him from the hatred he had incurred by favouring Menalcidas the Lacedæmonian. When news was brought to Lacedæmon, that Diæus was endeavouring to get this new law approved by the general aſſembly, the whole city was in an uproar, for the Roman ſenate had in expreſs terms allowed them to judge their criminals in their own private aſſemblies; they were for ſending deputies to Rome, but Diæus pretended, that only the general aſſembly of the whole nation had a right of ſending embaſſadors thither [q].

New troubles in Peloponneſus.

THESE arbitrary proceedings greatly exaſperated the Lacedæmonians; but, as they were no ways in a condition to make head againſt the whole ſtrength of Achaia, they humbled themſelves ſo far as to ſend deputies to Diæus, who was advancing at the head of a conſiderable army, entreating him not to uſe force till other means of a reconciliation proved fruitleſs. The prætor anſwered the deputies, that he had no quarrel with the Lacedæmonians in general, but only with a few diſturbers of the public peace, whom he named to the number of twenty-four. Upon the return of the deputies the council of Lacedæmon aſſembled, when Ageſiſthenes, a man of great authority, moved, that thoſe who had been named by Diæus ſhould of their own accord abandon their country, as if they had been baniſhed, and carry their complaints to Rome. The motion was applauded by the whole aſſembly, and the perſons that had been named withdrew without delay from their native native country. When the council of Lacedæmon heard that they were got out of Laconia, ſentence of death was pronounced againſt them in a full aſſembly, which aſſwaged the anger of Diæus and his Achæans. But when they heard that the exiles, together with Menalcidas, were embarqued for Italy to lay their complaints before the ſenate, Diæus and Callicrates made what haſte they could after them to plead the cauſe of the Achæans againſt the Lacedæmonians. But they did not both reach Rome; Callicrates, who had great intereſt in that city died at Rhodes, whither his affairs had called him. Diæus therefore and Menalcidas only appeared before the ſenate, and by their Greek eloquence diſguiſed the truth with ſuch artifice, that the ſenators could not come to any determination. Commiſſioners were therefore appointed to determine the diſpute on the ſpot. But as they were too dilatory in ſetting out, Menalcidas and Diæus, arriving in Peloponneſus long before them, put all the country in a flame, which they on their arrival could not extinguiſh. Diæus aſſured the Achæan aſſembly, that every thing would be determined by the commiſſioners in their favour. On the other hand, Menalcidas brought the Lacedæmonians word, that in a ſhort time their city and territory would be ſeparated from the Achæan league and declared an independent ſtate. The Achæans hearing this reſoved to take up arms and force the Lacedæmonians to change their language [r].

[q] Pauſan. in Achaic.

Metellus endeavours to compoſe them.

Metellus, who was then buſy in ſettling the affairs of Macedon, being informed of the troubles in Peloponneſus, deſired the embaſſadors, which Rome was ſending into Aſia, to take Corinth and Lacedæmon in their way, in order to perſuade the Achæans to ſuſpend all hoſtilities till the arrival of the commiſſioners, who had been nominated to compoſe their differences in an amicable manner. Theſe embaſſadors arriving in Achaia found Democritus, who had ſucceeded Diæus in the office of prætor, in full march with a deſign to fall upon the Lacedæmonians. They exhorted him to diſband his men and return home, but the prætor, deſpiſing their advice, advanced to the very walls of Lacedæmon, and there gained a conſiderable advantage over the Lacedæmonians, who, having loſt a thouſand of their men, retired with ſuch precipitation into the city, that if Democritus had warmly purſued them, he might might have entered Lacedæmon with the fugitives. But he was over-haſty in ſounding a retreat, contenting himſelf with the advantage he had gained; which ſo diſpleaſed the general aſſembly, that they fined him in fifty talents, which ſum not being able to raiſe, he was obliged to lay down his office and ſave himſelf by flight out of the Achæan territories. Then Diæus, who had been the author of all the troubles, and was a declared enemy to Lacedæmon, was again elected prætor. Metellus no ſooner heard of his promotion, but he ſent a deputation to him, entreating him to forbear hoſtilities till the arrival of the commiſſioners. Diæus complied with his requeſt, but was not in the mean time idle; for he gained over to the Achæans by ſecret negotiations all the cities that bordered upon Laconia, and having fortified them, kept that country and its capital in a manner blocked up. In this diſtreſs the Lacedæmonians thinking no man ſo proper to extricate them out of theſe difficulties as Menalcidas, who had governed the whole Achæan republic, appointed him commander in chief of their troops. Menalcidas was a man of great valour, but betrayed want of prudence in the very firſt ſtep he took. For, to give ſome reputation to his arms, he immediately took the field, and ſurpriſing the city Jaſos, which was within the borders of Laconia but ſubject to the Achæans, plundered it, and divided the booty among his ſoldiers. This was breaking the truce which had been granted by the Achæans at the inſtance of Metellus, and drawing upon himſelf the reſentment of the Romans. The Lacedæmonians themſelves were well appriſed, that ſuch unwarrantable proceedings might give a bad turn to their cauſe, and therefore would have puniſhed their general with the utmoſt ſeverity, had he not prevented them by laying violent hands on himſelf [s].

[r] Pauſan, ubi ſupra. p. 421. 428. Polyb. legat. 143, 144. Id. in excerpt. de virt. & vit. Juſtin, l. xxxiv. c. 1. Flor, l. ii. c. 16.

Comiſſioners ſent from Rome into Achaia.

NOT long after the death of Menalcidas, the Roman commiſſioners arrived in Peloponneſus. As they were ſent to put an end to a civil war which was kindled in the heart of Achaia, they landed at Corinth, which was looked upon as the capital of the Achæan league. There they ſummoned the aſſembly, which Aurelius Oreſtes, who was at the head of the commiſſioners, opened with a ſpeech calculated rather to create than to compoſe diviſions. Polybius is of opinion, that he exceeded the inſtructions he had brought brought from Rome, and changed the menaces of the ſenate into abſolute orders [t] ; for he told them, that Rome had been long endeavouring to eſtabliſh a happy union among the free cities of Greece, but was at laſt convinced, that ſuch an union could never be effected ſo long as their preſent form of government ſubſiſted. " Flaminius, ſaid " he, ſet your cities at liberty, a bleſſing which they might " have enjoyed ſeparately ; but you choſe to form a league " among yourſelves, a league which ſhould depend on a " general aſſembly, and be governed by a prætor choſen " by a plurality of voices. In this you endeavoured to " ſecure your common ſafety ; but your precaution has " only produced troubles and diviſions. Your deputies " do not agree among themſelves ; your aſſemblies make " laws which every particular city will not obſerve. " This obliges you to have recourſe to arms ; and hence " theſe eternal diviſions, hence theſe hoſtilities, which " makes it neceſſary for you to be always under arms, " and to look upon your confederates as enemies. Rome " is concerned to ſee ſo many inteſtine wars kindled " among you, knows the cauſe of theſe evils, and is re- " ſolved to put a ſtop to them. When you are leſs uni- " ted you will be more happy, and will never be com- " pletely ſo till you make the neceſſary ſeparations. At- " tend then to the orders of the ſenate, which I am go- " ing to declare, and put them in execution with readi- " neſs. It is the will and pleaſure of the Roman ſenate " and people, that all the cities which were not formerly " of the Achæan league, that is, Corinth, Lacedæmon, " Argos, Heraclea (B), and Orchomenos (C), be ſepa- " rated from the general alliance, and governed by their " own laws independently of the confederacy [u]".

[s] Pauſan. Polyb. &c. ibid.

No ſooner had Aurelius pronounced theſe words, but the Achæan deputies, without giving him time to end his ſpeech The commiſſioners ill uſed and inſulted.

[t] Polyb. legat. 143. [u] Idem. ibid.

Year of the flood, 2856. Year before Chriſt, 147.

(B) This city of Heraclea ſtood in Phthiotis, a province of Theſſaly, near the paſs of Thermopylæ. It was called Heraclea Trachinea, to diſtinguiſh it from ſeveral other cities bearing the ſame name.

(C) Orchomenos was one of the largeſt cities of Bæotia, and famous for a temple dedicated to the three graces, which was one of the moſt antient and wealthy of Greece.

speech, left the assembly, and calling together the people of Corinth in the market-place, acquainted them with the decree which the commissioners had brought from Rome. The whole city was in an uproar, and the multitude, being enraged to the highest degree, fell upon all the Lacedæmonians they could find in the city, and either stript them or put them to death. Even those who fled to the house of the commissioners for refuge were dragged from thence, and treated like the rest. Aurelius and his collegues in vain cried out, that their republic would revenge the injuries done to the Lacedæmonians; the incensed multitude was deaf to their remonstrances; nay, they would have treated the commissioners themselves in the same manner, had they not saved themselves by a timely flight [w].

The commissioners on their return to Rome not only set the insults they had received at Corinth in the strongest light, but are said to have exaggerated them beyond measure; they represented the tumult, not as a sudden commotion, but as a premeditated plot. The senate was highly incensed at such proceedings, but thought it advisable to use moderation: Carthage was not yet taken, nor the two pretended sons of Perses entirely subdued; they thought it therefore necessary to be very cautious in treating with so powerful a republic, as that of Achaia, in so critical a juncture. Hence they voted only for sending three new commissioners into Achaia, instructing them to complain in a very gentle manner, and only to exhort the Achæans not to give ear to bad counsel, lest by their imprudence they should draw upon themselves a war, which it was in their power to avoid by punishing those who had exposed them to it. The commissioners embarked without delay, and after their arrival in Peloponnesus met a deputy sent by the Achæans to acquaint the senate with their proceedings against Orestes; but the commissioners carried him back with them to Ægium, where the diet of the nation had been summoned to assemble. Sextus Julius, a man of great prudence and moderation, was at the head of this new deputation; when he was introduced to the assembly, he spoke with that air of mildness which was natural to him, seasoning his reproches with the most tender expressions. "We can excuse, excuſe," ſaid he, "The firſt commotions of a multitude "led aſtray by a miſtaken zeal for their country; we are "ſenſible that the magiſtrates cannot govern them on ſuch "occaſions. If our embaſſadors have ſuffered any ill "treatment in thoſe blind tranſports, the fault may be "eaſily repaired. The Romans will be appeaſed with "the leaſt ſigns of repentance. All the ſatisfaction "Rome requires of you is, that you leave Lacedæmon in "peace and reſtore tranquillity to Peloponneſus [x]".

New commissioners sent into Achaia.

[w] Idem ibid.

THESE moderate remonſtrances, in which Julius deſignedly omitted ſaying one word of ſeparating any cities from the Achæan league, were received with great applauſe by the major part of the aſſembly. But Critolaus and Diæus endeavoured to efface the impreſſions, which Julius's ſpeech had made on the minds of the aſſembly, by inſinuating, that it was dangerous to truſt the ſeeming moderation of the Romans; that Rome only ſuſpended her revenge till Carthage was deſtroyed; that they would ſoon ſee her legions laying waſte Peloponneſus, as they had done Africa, and conſequently, that it was neceſſary, to prevent ſuch hoſtilities, by raiſing up enemies againſt the Romans and utterly deſtroying their friends. Such were the diſcourſes of Critolaus, and Dicœus in their private conventicles among men of their own ſtamp and devoted to their faction. But in public they ſpoke a very different language, and treated the commiſſioners with great civility. Critolaus, who was then prætor, invited them to Tegœa to meet an extraordinary aſſembly, in which the affairs of Lacedæmon ſhould be amicably adjuſted to the ſatisfaction of both parties. Accordingly Julius and his collegues went with the Lacedœmonians to the place appointed, where they waited a long time for the arrival of the deputies: but no Achæan appeared. While the Romans were thus attending in a corner of the province, Critolaus was ſending expreſſes from city to city, forbidding them to ſend their deputies to the congreſs. Julius began to be impatient and expreſs his uneaſineſs, when Critolaus came all along to Tegæa, and to the great ſurprize of the Romans told them, that the diſpute between the Achæans and Lacedæmonians was of too great importance to be decided in a private aſſembly: that it was neceſſary to refer it to the general diet, which could not be assembled according to law in less than six months.

Critolaus and Diæus ſtir up the people againſt the Romans.

[x] Idem Legat. 144.

JULIUS was highly affronted at such deceitful proceedings; he dismissed the Lacedæmonians, and returning to Rome complained, that the republic had been insulted and her embassadors personally ill used and derided. On the other hand, the prætor gloried in having mortified Rome in her envoys, and took no one step to appease her wrath. He was out of hatred to the Romans desirous of war, but would not commit hostilities the first, for fear of being censured by his own nation. He therefore treated the embassadors in the manner we have related, being well appprized, that contempt would as effectually exasperate that haughty people as open hostilities.

Metellus endeavours in vain to bring Critolaus to reason.

HOWEVER, Rome was not in haste to come to an open rupture; notwithstanding the loud complaints of Julius and his collegues, the senate would not resolve on a war, but contented themselves with referring the affair to Metellus, who was settling the province of Macedon, after having conquered the two false pretenders to that crown. The orders sent him were to treat with Critolaus, as of himself, in order to bring him to reason. Metellus immediately dispatched four Romans of distinguished birth, viz. Cn. Papirius, Ælius Lamia, A. Gabinius, and Q. Fannius into Peloponnesus, enjoining them to lay before the assembly of Achaia the evils which Critolaus and his partizans were by their rash behaviour drawing upon them.

IN the mean time Critolaus ran from city to city, summoning assemblies under colour of communicating to them what had passed in the conferences at Tegæa; but in fact to vent invectives against the Romans, and put an odious construction upon all they had done. In order to encrease his party, he published an edict, forbidding all judges to prosecute or imprison any Achæan for debt, till the dispute between the assembly and Lacedæmon was at an end. By this means he disposed the multitude to receive willingly what orders he thought fit to give them; incapable of making suitable reflections on the future, they fell in with the passions of a madman, who neither foresaw his own misfortunes nor those of his own nation.

His deputies insulted and abused.

DURING these transactions the four deputies sent by Metellus landed at Corinth, where the general assembly bly was then ſitting. This new embaſſy ought to have been received with reſpect, as it came from a victorious general, whoſe army was encamped in Macedon within reach of Greece. But Critolaus treated them worſe than thoſe who had been ſent from Rome. He would not ſuffer them to appear before the aſſembly, but commanded them to declare their buſineſs to the populace aſſembled in the market-place. To this factious aſſembly, conſiſting of artificers and the refuſe of the people of Corinth, Cn. Papirius ſpoke with, at leaſt, as much moderation as Julius had done before the heads of the nation. His diſcourſe tended to ſhew, that it was the intereſt of Achaia to keep up a good correſpondence with Rome; he took care not to mention the ſeparation of Lacedæmon and the other cities from the Achæan league. This was interpreted by Critolaus as a proof of their fear; and upon this prejudice a great croud of artificers fell upon the embaſſadors, loaded them with reproaches, and drove them with all manner of affronts out of the market-place [y]. All the cities of Achaia were at that time ſeized, we may ſay, with a kind of madneſs, but Corinth was more furious than the reſt. They were perſuaded, that Rome intended to enſlave them and abſolutely deſtroy the Achæan league, which perſuaſion made them deaf to all the remonſtrances of thoſe who diſapproved the wild meaſures of Critolaus.

THE turbulent prætor, finding all things ſucceed to his wiſh, harangued the multitude, in order to inflame them againſt ſuch of the nobility as refuſed to enter into his views. He even named two men of unblameable characters, accuſing them of informing the Roman embaſſadors of all that paſſed in the national aſſemblies. One of theſe by name Strategius immediately gave the prætor the lie, and ſteadily inſiſted on his innocence. But the multitude was for the prætor and Strategius condemned, notwithſtanding he called the gods to witneſs that he had never diſcovered any thing tranſacted in the aſſemblies. This notorious piece of injuſtice convinced Critolaus that he had gained an abſolute aſcendent over the people; whereupon, carrying his fury to the utmoſt extremity, in the ſame aſſembly he cauſed war to be declared with Lacedæmon, and conſequently with the Romans [z].

War declared with the Lacedæmonians and Romans.

UPON the declaration of war the embaſſadors parted; Papirius repaired to Lacedæmon to watch the enemies motions;

[y] Flor. in Epit. Flor. l. 2. c. 16. Pauſan. ubi ſupra. Oroſius, &c.

[z] Polyb. Legat. 144. Pauſan. in Achaic.

tions; Ælius set out for Naupactus, and the other two for the camp in Macedon, to excite Metellus not to delay revenging the affronts offered to Rome in her embassadors. Accordingly Metellus, without waiting for the orders of the senate, put himself at the head of his army, and began his march towards Achaia, with a design to enter it by Thessaly.

The cities of Thebes in Bœotia and Chalcis in Eubœa, having been disobliged by Metellus since his abode in Macedon, joined the Achæans. The inhabitants of Thebes had been condemned by Metellus to make the Phocians satisfaction for the losses the latter had suffered by their frequent incursions, and moreover to deliver up to the inhabitants of Amphissa in Locris (D) the third part of their harvest, for having reaped the corn of their neighbours as if it had been their own. The inhabitants of Chalcis had ravaged part of Eubœa, and Metellus had obliged them to make restitution. Upon these motives the two cities entered into the rash measures of Critolaus, and joined him with their troops. With such feeble aids the Achæan prætor believed himself able to cope with the most powerful state in the world; so far had his rage and hatred against the Romans got the better of his reason. Both Critolaus and Diæus had been of the number of those exiles, whom the Romans had kept so long in Italy in a kind of slavery, and were therefore determined to revenge themselves even at the expence of their country.

Heraclea besieged by the Achæans.

Critolaus, being joined by the troops of Thebes and Chalcis, took the field, and marched against Heraclea, a city of the Achæan league which refused to send its contingent to the prætor. While he was besieging this town, news was brought him that Metellus was drawing near, which struck him with such terror that he immediately broke up the siege and withdrew into Achaia. He might easily have seized the pass of Thermopylæ, and there stopped at least, if not defeated, the Roman army. But his courage failed him all at once, and his retreat had all the appearance of a flight. Metellus pursued him close, and

The siege raised and the Achæans defeated.

at

(D) Amphissa stood on the banks of a little river bearing the same name, and was one of the greatest cities in Locris. Some think it stood where Solona now stands; but Niger thinks, its antient situation agrees better with that of a little village now called Lambino.

at laſt came up with him, and routed him. Hiſtorians have not told us the particulars of this battle, but we may well conclude that it coſt the Achæans dear, for their army was entirely defeated, and above a thouſand of them taken priſoners. Critolaus himſelf loſt his life on this occaſion; for he never appeared afterwards, neither was his body found in the field of battle: ſome ſay, he poiſoned himſelf in ſome remote corner of Greece, others, that he threw himſelf down from mount Oeta into a marſh and was drowned [a].

Diæus ſucceeds Critolaus, and makes great preparations for the war.

It was an eſtabliſhed law among the Achæans, that when their prætor died during his office, his immediate predeceſſor ſhould ſucceed him, and govern the republic till the next general aſſembly, which met at a ſtated time. By this law Diæus took upon him the government of the republic and the command of the ſcattered army. But ſcarce was he inveſted with this dignity, when news was brought him, that a body of above a thouſand Arcadians, who had joined the Achæans and after the battle retired to Elatea in Phocis, had been all to a man cut in pieces by Metellus. This was a melancholy piece of news; however, as he had been the chief author of the war, it behoved him to maintain it; he therefore ſent deputies to all the cities of Achaia, enjoining them to raiſe new troops with all poſſible expedition, and cauſed an edict to be publiſhed, in all the places that were ſubject to the Achæan league, to this purport; That no leſs than twelve thouſand ſlaves, who had been born in the country, ſhould be enliſted; and that, if it was neceſſary, ſome of the ſlaves that had been brought from foreign countries, ſhould be taken into the ſervice to complete that number; that all thoſe who were fit to bear arms, whether in Achaia or Arcadia, ſhould repair to Corinth, and there take the military oaths; that all perſons of ſubſtance, whether men or women, ſhould bring all the gold or ſilver into the public treaſury. This convinced all Achaia of the danger that threatned them; but, as they were embarked in a war with an enemy whom they had ſo highly provoked, they blindly purſued the mad ſcheme. The cities of Elea, Meſſene, and Patræ, were ſo terrified, when they heard that a conſular army was coming from Rome, and that a conſul with new legions was to take the place of the prætor Metellus, that the inhabitants gave themſelves up to deſpair, and either abandoned their country, or laid violent hands on themſelves, through fear of falling under the conqueror's power. Theſe cities were expoſed to the firſt attacks of the enemy after their landing, and expected the moſt ſevere treatment. Some had recourſe to the clemency of Metellus, flying to his camp for refuge. There they informed againſt the moſt factious among their countrymen, though no enquiry was yet made after them [b].

[a] Polyb. Pauſan. ibid.

Thebes taken by Metellus.

In the mean time the Roman prætor entered Arcadia, and drew near Thebes, which had openly declared for the Achæan league. Pythias, the chief magiſtrate of that city, had ſtirred up all the inhabitants againſt the Romans, and treated with great ſeverity ſuch as were unwilling to enter into his meaſures. It was chiefly with a view to ſeize him that Metellus turned his arms againſt Thebes; but Pythias had retired from his native country with his wife and children before the arrival of the army. Moſt of the citizens had followed his example and abandoned the city, which Metellus entered without oppoſition. The few citizens that remained he treated with great clemency, and ſaved the temples and houſes from being plundered, but ſet a price on Pythias's head. This mixture of mildneſs and ſeverity was very pleaſing to the people, but ſtruck the magiſtrates with new terror. From Thebes the Roman general marched to Megara, which important poſt was guarded by one Alcamenes, with a detachment of four thouſand men. But the cowardly governor at the approach of the prætorian army left the place, and retired to Corinth where he joined Diæus. The inhabitants of Megara opened their gates to the Romans, and put them in poſſeſſion of the moſt fruitful territory of Achaia.

Megara ſubmits.

Metellus ſends new deputies to to treat of a peace.

And now Metellus, ſeeing moſt of the Achæans ſtruck with terror and inclined to peace, thought that ſuch a favourable opportunity of gaining Diæus and his faction was not to be neglected. He had been informed, that the conſul Mummius was charged with the war in Achaia, and had already ſet out from Rome, with orders from the ſenate to ſettle affairs in Greece by the deſtruction of Corinth. To deprive therefore Mummius of this glory, and at the fame

[b] Polyb. & Pauſan. ibid.

ſame time ſave that noble city, he ſent new deputies to treat of a peace. For this embaſſy he did not chuſe Romans, but three Achæans of great diſtinction and credit in their own country, who had taken ſanctuary in the Roman camp. Theſe were Andronidas, Logius, and Archippus, men well affected to the Romans, but ſtrongly touched with the misfortunes which threatened their country. Up- They are on their arrival at Corinth they found the people in general inclined to peace, but the prætor and his faction more than ever bent upon a war. They were by his order thrown into priſon, after he had produced them before the aſſembly of the people and declared them traitors and enemies to their country. Neither could he be prevailed upon to alter his meaſures, either by the remonſtrances of Philo, an Achæan of great authority, who came on purpoſe from Theſſaly, or by the entreaties of Stratius, a man of diſtinguiſhed merit and his particular friend. In ſpite of all their efforts the mad prætor ſentenced the three deputies to die, and prevailed upon the chief members of the council, who were devoted to his faction, to confirm the unjuſt ſentence; nay, they joined with them in the ſame condemnation one Soſicrates, a venerable ſenator, whoſe only crime was his having voted for treating of a peace with the Romans. Soſicrates was executed a few days after, and no kind of torture ſpared to extort from him ſuch a confeſſion as Diæus wanted; but he maintained to the laſt, that peace was preferable to war, and this inflexible conſtancy made no ſmall impreſſion on the minds of the people. As for Andronidas and his collegues, the avaricious prætor ſold them their deliverance at a great price. A few days before, Diæus had cauſed one Phillius and his children to be put to death, only becauſe they were ſuſpected of correſponding with Menalcidas at Lacedæmon, and inclining to favour the Roman faction. Thus were the unfortunate Achæans governed by magiſtrates, who had no other rule of conduct but their paſſions, and no other talent for war, but a ſavage fierceneſs, and a blind deſire of revenge [c].

treated as enemies.

An account of the many advantages gained by Metellus being tranſmitted to Rome by one Poſthumius, without the general's knowledge, the conſul Mummius haſtened his departure for Achaia, which had fallen to his lot. Why the ſenate would not ſuffer Metellus to finiſh a war, which he had proſecuted ſo far, is what we find no where recorded. When [c] Idem ibid.

When the conſul landed the numerous army he brought with him, Metellus was advancing to Corinth, with a deſign to uſe his utmoſt efforts, in order to bring Diæus to accept of a peace before the arrival of the conſular army, and thereby deprive Mummius of the glory of finiſhing the war. But the obſtinate prætor would hearken to no conditions how advantageous ſoever, which gave Metellus great concern, and made him loſe all hopes of ſettling Achaia in peace before the arrival of the conſul.

The conſul Mummius arrives in Greece. Year of the flood, 2857. Before Chriſt 146.

THIS was the poſture of affairs in Achaia, when Mummius appeared before Corinth with a conſular army, conſiſting of three thouſand five hundred horſe, and twenty-three thouſand foot, beſides a body of Cretan archers, and the Pergamean troops ſent by Attalus the ſon of Eumenes. His firſt care was to ſend back Metellus and his forces into Macedon, leſt he ſhould ſhare with him the glory of concluding the war. He then drew near the city, and encamped at the iſthmus of Corinth poſting advanced-guards round the town. But as no enemy appeared, the Achæan army being ſhut up in the city, the Romans ſtraggled about the fields, and neglected their poſts; which the Corinthians obſerving made a vigorous ſally, fell upon the legionaries, and purſued them with great ſlaughter to their camp. This ſmall advantage encouraged the Achæans, and inſpired Diœus with hopes of conquering the conſul, who on his ſide did all that lay in his power to confirm him in his fooliſh perſuaſion; he kept his legions cloſe in the camp, and pretended not to be able to bear the ſight of the enemy. Diœus, now becoming audacious and ſure of victory, aſſembled all thoſe who were able to bear arms and formed them into a phalanx, which with the auxiliaries from Chalcis made up an army equal, if not ſuperior, in number to that of the Romans. They wanted experience and diſcipline; but Diœus thought that deſpair and the importance of their cauſe would ſupply that want. He therefore advanced with his troops and offered the conſul battle, which he declined, in order to draw the Achæans into a valley called Leucopetra, at the extremity of the iſthmus which joined Attica to Peloponneſus. Accordingly the prætor fell into the ſnare, and repaired thither long before the conſul. Diœus was ſo ſure of victory, that he had invited the women and children of Corinth to be ſpectators from the neighbouring hills of the ſlaughter he was going to make of the enemy; he had alſo ordered a great number of waggons to follow the army, my, which were to be loaded with the ſpoils of the Romans [d].

NEVER was there a more raſh and ill-grounded confidence. The faction of Dicæus had removed from the ſervice and from the public counſels all thoſe who were capable of commanding the troops or directing affairs, and had ſubſtituted in their room others who had no experience in civil or military concerns; the ſoldiers had never before ſeen the face of an enemy, and were quite unacquainted with military diſcipline; and nevertheleſs the raſh prætor promiſed himſelf victory, over a conſular army inured to the greateſt dangers. While the Achæans were thus triumphing in the plains of Leucopetra, and only ſollicitous leſt the conſul ſhould find means to make his eſcape, he unexpectedly appeared with his army drawn up in battalia. He had the day before placed in an ambuſcade a ſtrong body of horſe, with orders to ſally out in the heat of the action, and attack the Achæan phalanx in flank. The Achæans advanced furiouſly, but their cavalry was ſoon put to the rout. The phalanx made a vigorous reſiſtance; but at length, being attacked in front by the legionaries and by the cavalry in flank, it was broke and diſperſed. The ſlaughter then was dreadful; we are told, that the two ſeas, which were divided by the iſthmus of Corinth, were dyed with blood. If Dicæus had retired into Corinth, he might have held it a long time, notwithſtanding the loſs of the battle, and obtained an honourable capitulation from Mummius; for Corinth was at that time one of the ſtrongeſt places in the world, and the conſul's ſole aim was to deſerve a triumph by putting a ſpeedy end to the war. But Dicæus abandoning himſelf to deſpair, rode full ſpeed to Megalopolis his native country, and entering his houſe ſet fire to it, threw his wife into the flames leſt ſhe ſhould fall into the enemy's hands, and put an end to his unhappy life by poiſon [e].

The Achæans defeated by Mummius.

AFTER this defeat all things were in the utmoſt confuſion at Corinth. The inhabitants, finding themſelves without council, leaders, or courage, fled to other places for ſafety, leaving the city deſerted. The gates were open, and no body appeared on the walls to defend them. The conſul hearing this could ſcarcely believe it, and fearing ſome ambuſcade, reſtrained the ardour of his ſoldiers, who were were very eager to enter Corinth, and enrich themſelves with the plunder of ſo wealthy a city. Mummius was thus in ſuſpenſe for the ſpace of three days, at the end of which, after having taken all proper precautions, and narrowly obſerved all places, both within and without the city, he entered it at the head of his troops, and gave it up to the rage and avarice of his ſoldiers. The men, who had not been able to prevail upon themſelves to forſake their native country, were all put to the ſword, and the women and children ſold for ſlaves to the beſt bidder. Then the town was ranſacked by the greedy ſoldiers; and who can reckon up the immenſe treaſures they found? There were more veſſels of all ſorts of metals, more fine pictures, and ſtatues of the greateſt maſters in Corinth, than in any city in the world. All the princes of Europe and Aſia, who had any taſte in painting and ſculpture, furniſhed themſelves here with their richeſt moveables; here were caſt the fineſt ſtatues for temples and palaces, and all the liberal arts brought to their greateſt perfection. Many ineſtimable pieces of the moſt famous painters and ſtatuaries fell into the hands of ſoldiers, who not knowing their value either deſtroyed them, or parted with them for a few drachmas. Polybius was an eye-witneſs of the want of taſte in the Romans of thoſe days. This brave Achæan, upon the firſt news that his countrymen had taken up arms againſt Rome, left Africa, where he was attending Scipio at the ſiege of Carthage, and haſtened to Achaia to do his country what ſervice he could. He was in the Roman army when Corinth was plundered, and had the mortification to ſee the Roman ſoldiers playing at dice on a picture of Ariſtides (E), which was accounted one of the wonders of the world. They ſet no value on that maſter-piece, and therefore willingly parted with it for a more convenient table to play upon. But when the ſpoils of Corinth were put up to ſale, Attalus king of Pergamus offered for it ſix hundred thouſand ſeſterces, that is near five thouſand pounds of our money. The conſul, ſurprized that the price of a picture ſhould be carried Mummius enters Corinth, and plunders it.

[d] Pauſan. ubi ſupra. Auth. de vir. illuſtr. [e] Pauſan. in Achaic. Zonaras. l. 9. c. 31.

(E) Ariſtides, who was contemporary with Apelles, flouriſhed at Thebes about the 122d Olympiad. He is ſaid to have been the firſt that attempted to repreſent the paſſions of the ſoul in colours. The piece here ſpoke of was a Bacchus, ſo exquiſitely done, that it was proverbially ſaid of any extraordinary performance; It is as well done as the Bacchus of Ariſtides (11).

(11) Plin. l. 35, c. 4, & 10.

ried ſo high, thought there was ſome magical virtue in it, and therefore interpoſing his authority retained it, notwithſtanding the complaints of Attalus. He was not actuated in ſo doing by his private intereſt, for he did not appropriate it to himſelf, but placed it in the temple of Ceres, where Strabo had the pleaſure of ſeeing it before it was conſumed in the fire which reduced that temple to aſhes [f]. Mummius was a great warrior, but ſeems to have had no taſte for painting or ſculpture; for when he put the pictures and ſtatues he had taken in Corinth on board the tranſports, he told the maſters of the veſſels very ſeriouſly, that if any of them were either loſt or ſpoiled, he would oblige them to find others at their own coſt. As if any other pieces could have ſupplied the loſs of thoſe ineſtimable originals, done by the moſt celebrated maſters in Greece [g]. Were it not to be wiſhed, ſays the hiſtorian who has tranſmitted this fact to poſterity, that this happy ignorance ſtill ſubſiſted? would it not be far preferable to that delicacy of taſte for ſuch rarities which prevails in the preſent age [h]? He ſpoke at a time when the governors of the provinces uſed all manner of frauds and extortions, to enrich themſelves and their families with ſuch valuable moveables.

CORINTH being thus pillaged, nothing remained but to reduce it to aſhes, purſuant to the decree of the ſenate, which the conſul was obliged to put in execution. Fire was ſet to all the corners of the city at the ſame time, and the flames growing more violent as they drew near the centre, at laſt united there, and made one general conflagration, which is ſaid to have produced that famous mixture which art could never imitate. The gold, ſilver, and braſs, which the Corinthians had concealed, were melted and ran down the ſtreets in ſtreams. Some of the greedy ſoldiers in attempting to ſave part of thoſe metals periſhed in the flames. When the fire was extinguiſhed, a new metal was found compoſed of ſeveral different ones (F), and greatly eſteemed in the follow-

Corinth reduced to aſhes.

[f] Strab. l. 8. p. 381. Plin. l. 35. c. 4. & 10. Cic. de Offic. l. 1. c. 76, 77. [g] Vel. Pat. l. 1. c. 13. [h] Idem ibid.

(F) Pliny tells us, that there were three ſorts of Corinthian braſs, viz. the red, the white, and that which was of the colour of money, according to the different proportions of gold, ſilver, and copper, that were in it (12).

(12) Plin. l. 7. c. 38.

following ages. The walls of the city were demolished and razed to the very foundations. Thus was Corinth destroyed the same year that Carthage was laid in ashes. By the destruction of two such cities the Romans intended to strike terror into the rest of the world, and keep all nations steady in their obedience to Rome. Corinth was destroyed nine hundred and fifty two years after its foundation by Aletes the son of Hippotes, sixth in descent from Hercules. Cicero, who approved of the destruction of Carthage and Numantia, wished that Corinth, where the arts of painting and sculpture seemed to have taken up their habitation, had been spared [i].

It does not appear, that the Achæans had any thoughts of raising new troops for the defence of their country, or summoned an assembly to deliberate on the measures it was necessary to take. No one took upon him to propose any remedy for the public calamities, or endeavoured to appease the Romans by sending deputies to implore their clemency. One would have thought, that the Achæan league had been buried under the ruins of Corinth; so much had the dreadful destruction of this city alarmed and universally dismayed the whole confederacy.

It was now necessary to determine the fate of the Achæans in general. As to the Corinthians and such slaves as had taken up arms against Rome, they were all condemned to slavery, and carefully sought out in all the places whither they had fled. After this the whole nation was ordered to assemble in the open fields, where they were surrounded by the Roman legions; and because they were all afraid of being involved in one common misfortune, proclamation was made, that only the natives of Corinth, and such slaves as had served in the troops, should be made captives and be sold. The consul granted the rest of the inhabitants of Achaia their liberty, and sold the lands of the citizens of Corinth which were in great part purchased by the Sicyonians. Thebes, Chalcis, and some other cities, that had joined the Achæans, were by the consul's orders dismantled. Achaia was condemned to pay the Lacedæmonians two hundred talents for the damages they had suffered during the war. Soon after ten commissioners arrived from Rome to regulate the affairs of Greece in general, and of Achaia in particular, in conjunction with the consul. These abolished popular government in all the

[i] Cic. de Offic. l. 1. c. 35.

the cities, and eſtabliſhed magiſtrates, who were to govern each city according to their reſpective laws under the ſuperintendency of a Roman prætor. Thus the Achæan league was diſſolved, and Greece reduced to a Roman province, called the province of Achaia, becauſe at the taking of Corinth the Achæans were the moſt powerful people of Greece. The whole nation paid an annual tribute to Rome, and the prætor, who was ſent thither every year, was charged with the care of collecting it.

The Achæan league diſſolved, and Achaia reduced to a Roman province.

We have obſerved above, that Polybius on his return into Peloponneſus had the mortification to ſee the city of Corinth reduced to aſhes, and his country become a Roman province. If any thing was capable of mitigating his affliction on ſo mournful an occaſion, it was the opportunity he had of defending the memory of Philopœmen, his maſter in the ſcience of war. A Roman out of ſome private grudge to that great hero accuſed him before Mummius, as if he had been ſtill alive, of having been an enemy to the Romans, and always oppoſing their deſigns to the utmoſt of his power. What the accuſer propoſed by this new proſecution was, that all the ſtatues and monuments erected to the memory of Philopœmen in moſt cities of the Achæan league ſhould be deſtroyed, and his glorious feats buried in oblivion. The accuſation was not without foundation; for as that brave Achæan was a true friend to his country, ſo he was an enemy in his heart to the Romans, being well apprized, that nothing but the abſolute ſubjection of Greece could ſatisfy their pride and ambition. However, Polybius boldly took upon him his defence, and repreſented him as the greateſt man Greece had produced in latter times; he owned, that he might perhaps have carried his zeal for the liberty of his country a little too far; but that he had rendered the people of Rome conſiderable ſervices on various occaſions. The ten commiſſioners, at whoſe tribunal he pleaded ſo noble a cauſe, moved with his reaſons, but more with the gratitude he ſhewed in defending his maſter, decreed, that the ſtatues of Philopœmen ſhould not be touched, and that his monuments ſhould remain till they were over-turned by the deſtroyer of all things. Polybius, taking the advantage of Mummius's good diſpoſition, begged of him the ſtatues of Aratus and Achæus the founder of the nation, which were granted him, though they had been already tranſported out of Peloponneſus into Acarnania. At the ſame time he gave a ſignal proof of his diſintereſtedneſs, which gained him as much eſteem among his countrymen, trymen, as his defending the memory of Philopœmen. After the deſtruction of Corinth, the effects of thoſe who had been the authors of the inſults offered to the Roman embaſſadors were ſold by auction. When thoſe of Dicœus were put up, the commiſſioners ordered the quæſtor who ſold them, to let Polybius have out of them whatever he pleaſed, without taking any thing from him on that account. But Polybius refuſed the offer, ſaying, that he looked upon it as a very diſhonourable thing to enrich himſelf with the ſpoils of his fellow citizens [k].

THIS action gave the commiſſioners ſuch an idea of his virtue and probity, that, upon their leaving Peloponneſus, they appointed him to viſit all the cities of Greece, and every-where ſettle the new form of government. A very honourable commiſſion, which he diſcharged both to the ſatisfaction of the ſenate of Rome and the people of Achaia, who erected many ſtatutes in honour of their benefactor, and among others one with this inſcription: To the memory of Polybius, whoſe counſels would have ſaved Achaia, if they had been followed; and who comforted her in her diſtreſs [l].

MUMMIUS on his return to Rome was honoured with a triumph, which was embelliſhed with all the fineſt paintings and ſculptures that Greece had ever produced; and as he had made an abſolute conqueſt of Achaia, he ever after bore the ſirname of Achaicus. Thus the Romans deſtroyed every thing that gave them umbrage, and plundered other nations to enrich themſelves; which was making war, notwithſtanding their boaſted politeneſs, after the manner of Barbarians. From this time Achaia was governed, like the other Roman provinces, by a prætor ſent thither annually from Rome, till the reign of Nero, who reſtored all Greece to the enjoyment of its antient liberties, reducing at the ſame time Sardinia to a Roman province, and laying on that wealthy iſland the tribute which Achaia had paid [m]. By this means he favoured the Greeks without impairing the revenues of the empire. But they did not long enjoy the effects of his kindneſs, been ſoon after reduced by Veſpaſian to their former ſtate of ſubjection. This misfortune they brought anew upon themſelves by their domeſtic broils and diſcord, which could no otherwiſe be compoſed, but by depriving them of that liberty, which they [k] Polyb. in excerpt. p. 190, 192. [l] Pauſan. in Achaic.

[m] Suet. in Nero. Pauſan in Achaic. Plin. l. 4. c. 6. Eutrop. c. 4.

they no longer knew how to enjoy [n]. Under Nerva ſome ſhadow at leaſt of their liberty was reſtored to them; but they were ſtill governed by a Roman prætor, and alſo in Trajan's time, as appears from a letter of Pliny the younger to Maximus, who was ſent to govern Achaia, wherein, after having exhorted him to uſe his power with moderation, he concludes, that it would be barbarous and inhuman to deprive the Achæans of that faint image, that ſhadow which remained of their ancient liberty [o]. In this condition they remained with little alteration till the reign of Conſtantine the great, who in his new partition of the Roman provinces ſubjected Achaia to the Præfectus prætorio for Illyricum. Upon the diviſion of the empire, Achaia with the reſt of Greece fell to the emperors of the eaſt. Under Arcadius and Honorius all thoſe provinces ſuffered greatly by the incurſions of the Goths, who under their king Alaric laid waſte the whole country, reducing the ſtately and magnificent ſtructures, that were then remaining, to heaps of ruins [p]. From that time we find no account of any thing that paſſed among them till the reign of the emperor Emanuel or Manuel, who, in the twelfth century parcelling Peloponneſus out into ſeven principalities, divided it among his ſeven ſons, ſtiling them Deſpotes or Lords of Morea. Its reſemblance to the leaf of a mulberry-tree, called in Greek Morea, and in Latin Morus, gave occaſion to this appellation. In proceſs of time theſe dynaſties were not only beſtowed on the emperors children and the princes of the blood, but alſo on ſuch others as had diſtinguiſhed themſelves in the ſervice of their country. In the thirteenth century, when Conſtantinople was taken by the weſtern princes, the maritime cities of Peloponneſus, with moſt of the iſlands, were allotted to the Venetians. In the fifteenth century Conſtantine Dracoſes, Deſpote of Morea, being raiſed to the imperial throne, divided that province between his two brothers, Demetrius and Thomas, beſtowing Sparta on the former, and Corinth on the latter. Theſe princes falling out and making war upon each other, Mohammed II. took advantage of their diviſions, and, under pretence of aſſiſting the one againſt the other, ſtripped them both of their dominions. Thomas fled fled to Rome; but Demetrius, who had implored the assistance of the Barbarians against his brother, was carried captive to Adrianople. The Mohammedans, having thus got footing in Morea, soon drove the Venetians from the cities they possessed on the coast, and made themselves absolute masters of that fruitful province, holding it till they were in their turn driven out by the Venetians, under the conduct of Morosini in 1687. By the treaty of Carlowits in 1699. the Barbarians yielded it up to the republic of Venice; but retook it in 1715. and in their hands it still continues, being governed by a Sangiack, under the Beglerbeg of Greece, who resides at Modon [q].

[n] Pauſan. ibid. [o] Plin. l. 8. epiſt. 24. [p] Syneſius epiſt. 235. Claudian, in Ruffin, l. 2.

[q] Vide P. Coronelli descrizion di Morea, Alassandro Locatelli raconto della Veneta guerra in levante.

SECT.

AN INDEX TO THE SIXTH VOLUME.

The Figures direct to the Page, and Letter n to the Notes.

A.

ABA, a city in Phocis, by whom founded, 32, & seq.

Academia, by whom so called, 129.

Acarnania described, 81, n.

Acarnanians, why called anciently Curetes, 81, n. Join in the Achæan league, 577. Their character and bravery, ibid.

Acastus drives Jason out of Thessaly, 23, & seq.

Achæus, the son of Xuthus, founder of Achaia Proper, 85.

Achaia, whence so called, 85. Described, 86. Conquered by the Achæans, who had driven out of Argos and Lacedæmon, by the Dores & Heraclidæ, 87, & seq. Divided into twelve districts, 88. One of the chief great states after the Achæan league, 551. Its extent, provinces, &c. ibid. Laws and government, 352, & seq. Duration, 553. Made a Roman province, 671. Its various fates since, ibid & seq

Achæans, ancient Grecians, endeavour under Aratus to restore the liberty of Greece, 377. The league called by their name 552, & seq. Where formed, 553. The states who acceded to it, 554, & seq. Laws, &c. 561, & seq. Opposed by the Lacedæmonians, 527, & seq. Supported by Antigonus, 537, & seq. 563. Defeat the Spartans at Mantinea, 541. At Selasia, 569, & seq. War against the Ætolians, 572, & seq. Beaten at Caphya, 574. Invite Philip to their assistance, 575. Join in a confederate war, 577, & seq. Invade Elis, 580. Betrayed by Apelles, 585, & seq. Invade Ætolia, 587. Lacedæmon, 590. Make peace, 599. Forsake Philip and go over to the Romans, 611, & seq. Their gratitude to them, 618. Fall into new broils, 626. Send deputies to Rome, 628. Reduce Lacedæmon, 629. Courted by several princes, 630. Forced to restore the Lacedæmonians, 635, & seq. Routed by the Messanians, ibid. & seq. Betrayed to the Romans by their deputy, 640. Forced afresh to restore the Lacedæmonians, 641. Courted by Perses, 644. Declare for the Romans, ibid. & seq. Assist them against Perses, 646. Ungratefully used by them, 648. Protest against their injustice and cruelty, 649, 650. Obtain some few exiles to be restored, 651. Declare war against Rome, 653. Quarrel with the Lacedæmonians, ibid. & seq. Make war against them, 661. Defeated by Metellus, 662, 663. By the Roman consul, Mummius, 667. Made tributary to Rome, 670, & seq. Their league dissolved, ibid.

Achelous river, the fable of, 75, & 76 n.

Achilles king of Phthya 24. Born at Lariſſa, 24. His parents, 16, 17. Made invulnerable, invulnerable by his mother, ibid. His exploits before Troy, 25, & seq. Cruelty to Hector, ibid. Requited by Paris, ibid.

Acria, a sea-port in Lacedæmon, 48.

Acro-Corinth, the citadel of, vid. Corinth. Taken by Aratus, 555.

Acropolis, the citadel of Athens, 127. Stormed by the Persians, 202.

Acrotalus, prince of Sparta, his valiant defence of that city, 515. Succeeds his father Areus, 518. Slain, 519.

Actai at Athens, whence so called, 133.

Adultery, how punished by the Athenians, 120.

Æacus, king of Ægina, made one of the three judges of hell, 29, & n.

Æetes, king of Colchis, possessor of the golden fleece, 20, & seq. & n. His treatment of the Argonauts, 22, & seq. & n. Pursues them, but is stopped by the barbarity of his daughter, ibid.

Æginеans war with Attica, 174. Intercept their Delphic ship, 176. Beaten and subdued by the Athenians, 234, 235. Expelled the island, 265. Infest the Athenians, 340. Infested by the Spartans, 430, & seq.

Ægium, the assembly of the Achæan states formerly held there, but removed to Argos by Philopœmen, 626. Made the metropolis of Achaia, 8[illegible].

Æmilius Paulus defeats Perses, 646. Orders the chief men of Achaia to follow him to Rome, 648.

Æmonia, the daughter of Deucalion, 15.

——— the ancient name of Thessaly, ibid.

Ænesidemus, the brave governor of Argos, slain, 613, 614.

Æson, king of Thessaly, the father of Jason, 19. His death, 23.

Æthlius, the supposed founder of the Elean kingdom, 70.

Ætolia, from whom so called, 75. Described ibid. & seq. One of the three chief Greek states after the Achæan league, 551.

Ætolians, great robbers, 78, & seq. & 572. Out-wit and kill Nabis the Spartan tyrant, 548. Massacred by the Lacedæmonians, 548. Infest the Messenians, &c. by sea and land, 572.

Ætolus, the son of Endymion, king of Elis, 70. Founds the Ætolian kingdom, ibid. & seq.

——— the son of Oxylus, where buried, 74.

Agapenor, king of Arcadia, one of the Trojan chiefs, 12.

Agasicles, king of Sparta, vid. Archidamus, 428.

Agasthenes, king of Elis, routed by Oxylus, 73.

Age, old, highly honoured by the Lacedæmonians, 388, & seq.

Agelas's speech to king Philip at Naupactus, 598.

Agesilaus, king of Sparta, his character, 477. Succeeds Agis, ibid. & seq. Sent general against the Persians, 481. Affronts the Bœotians by sacrificing in their country, 484. Recalled by the ephori, 490, 491. Sent against the confederates, 492. Forces them to a general peace, 493, & seq. Invades Bœotia, 499. Chosen dictator, 501. Invades Arcadia, 502. Quells a conspiracy in Sparta, 503. Defeats Epaminondas and that general is slain, 507. Despised by Tachos, and helps to dethrone him, ibid. 507, & seq. His death and character, ibid.

Agesilaus, the uncle of Agis, helps him to reform the Spartan luxury, 520. Made one of the ephori, 523. Outwits his nephew, ibid.

Agesipolis, king of Sparta, succeeds his father Pausanias, 491. Sent against the Argives, 493. Against the Mantineans, 495. Reduces the Olynthians to great streights, and dies of a fever, 497.

——— the son of Cleombrotus, chosen king of Sparta, 538.

Agesistrata, mother of Agis, betrayed and murdered by Amphares, 525, & seq.

Agidæ, kings of Lacedæmon, from whom so called, 52, 64. A list of them, 378, & seq.

Agis, king of Lacedæmon, his severe reign, 63.

——— invades Attica, 277, & seq. 458, & seq. Offers peace to the Athenians, 286. Defeats the confederates near Mantinea, 293, 294. 463, & seq. His resentment against Alcibiades, 305, & seq. Repulsed from the gates of Athens, 317, 478. In a second attempt, 318. Successful in his third, 322, & seq. Invades Argos, and makes a truce with them, 462, & seq. Invades Elis, 465. Concludes a peace, ibid. His death, 476.

——— the son of Archidamus, sent embassador to Philip, 511. Succeeds his father, ibid. Beaten by the Macedonians, ibid. His glorious death, 512.

——— the son of Eudamidas, reforms the Spartan luxury, 520, & seq. Forced into a sanctuary, 523. Betrayed and murdered, 524.

Agnonides, Phocion's enemy, put to death 370.

Alcamenes, king of Sparta, 404. Wars against the Messenians, 405, & seq. His character and death, 406.

Alcibiades, the rival of Nicias, his character, 288, & seq. Makes a league with the Argives, 290, & 291, n. Makes a descent into Melos, 295. Accused of sacrilege, 297. Retires to Sparta, 298. In great esteem there, 299, 465. Sent to invade Ionia, 305. Forced to retire into Persia, 306. Cabals against the Athenians, ibid. & seq. Recalled thither, 310. Beats the confederates, 316. Takes Byzantium, 318. His triumph, ibid. & seq. Stript of his command, 319. His retirement and death, 327, & n.

Aletes, invades Corinth, 45.

Aleus, king of Arcadia, 11. His cruelty to his daughter, ibid. & n.

Alexamenus treacherously sent against Nabis, 547. Assassinates him, 548. Massacred by the Spartans, ibid.

Alexander the great chosen generalissimo of the Greeks, 361, & seq. Takes and sacks the city of Thebes, ibid. His friendship to Phocion, 362.

Alexandria, the temple of at Amyclæ, 49.

Aliacmon, river in Thessaly, 16.

Aliphera, taken by Philip king of Macedon, described, 582.

Alpheus, the famed river, described, 69, & n.

Althea, the mother of Meleager, the fable of 78, 79, n.

Ambracia, taken by Philip of Macedon, 578.

Ambraciots, drive out the Macedonian garrisons, 369.

Amompharetus breaks Pausanias's measures, 445.

Amphares, the betrayer and murderer of king Agis, his mother, &c. 524, & seq.

Amphictyons, the general court of Greece held at Delphos, 30. An instance of their power, ibid. & seq. Declare Alexander general of Greece, 361.

Amphilytus's prophecy to Pisistratus, 158.

Amphipolis taken from the Athenians, 285. Refuses to return after the Nician peace, 288. Taken by Philip of Macedon, 348.

Amplissa, metropolis of Ozolea Locr. by whom built, 82, & 83, n. Destroyed and rebuilt, ibid.

Amyclas, king of Lacedæmon, 55, & seq.

Amyclæ, the city of, described, 49. Taken by the Messenians, 421.

Amyclean security, a proverb, whence, 56.

Amycus, king of the Berbraces, overcome by Pollux, 20, n.

Anaxagoras, Pericles's preceptor accused of impiety 258. His philosophy and banishment, ibid. n.

Anaxander, king of Sparta, 418.

Anaxidamus, king of Sparta, 418.

Anaxandrides, king of Sparta, his character, 429.

Ancæus, one of the pilots of the Argonauts, 21, n.

Androcles, king of Mycenæ, killed in a fray, 404.

Andronidas and his colleagues unjusty condemned, 675.

Androsthenes defeated by Nicostratus, 616.

Antalcidas, the peace of 341. Dishonourable to the Greeks, ibid. & 493. His character, ibid. & 494, & n. His saying to Agesilaus, 499.

Antigonus sends his son Demetrius against the Athenians, 371. Deified by them, ibid. 372. Defeated and killed in Asia, 374.

——— Invited into Greece by the Achæans, 532, & seq. Invades Peloponnesus, 565. Chosen generalissimo of the Achæans, 566. Suffers the Argives to be ravaged, 567, 568. Defeats the Lacedæmonians at Selasia, 533. Becomes master of Sparta, 569.

Antiochus, king of Messenia, his embassy to the Lacedæmonians, 404, & seq.

——— the pilot of Alcibiades beaten by the Peloponnesians, 319.

Antipater, forsaken by the Thessalians, 364. Defeated by the confederate Greeks, ibid. Retreats to Lamia, ibid. Defeats the confederates, under Antiphalus and Memnon, 365. And makes peace with Athens, ibid. Defeats Agis, 511.

Antiphalus succeeds his brother Leosthenes, 365. Defeated, ibid.

Anytus's treachery to Socrates, 331. & seq.

Apelles's design of enslaving the Achæans, 581, & seq. Endeavours to disgrace Aratus with Antigonus, 583. Obstructs Antigonus's measures, 586. Condemned and forgiven by him, 590. Tyrannises over the Greeks, 592, & n. Put to death, 594.

Aphydas, prince of Arcadia, his portion, 10.

Apologues, among the Persian writers, a specimen of them, 294, 295, 296, n.

Aratus, the noble deliverer of Greece, his character, 377, 554, & seq. Restores the Athenians to their ancient liberty, ibid. The Sicyonians, 554. Joins with the Achæans, 555, & n Takes Acro-Corinth, ibid. Opposes the king of Sparta, 527. Invites the Macedonians, 531. Betrays Acro-Corinth to them, 532, 566. Beaten by the Etolians, Ætolians, 574. Accuſed and oppreſt by Apelles, 583, & ſeq. Cleared by Philip, 585. Choſen prætor of the Achæans, 595. Diſpleaſes Philip by an honeſt anſwer, 601. Retires from his court, ibid. Poiſoned by Philip's orders, 602. His funeral honours, and character, ibid. & ſeq.

——— his ſon poiſoned by Philip, 603.

Arcadia, from whom ſo named, 3. Its ſituation, ſoil, &c. 4. Origin and antiquity, 8. Liſt of its kings, ibid. Invaded by the Spartans, 504, & ſeq.

Arcadians, ancient Greeks, famous for paſtorals, 4. From rude ſhepherds become brave warriors, 4, 5 Their religion, 6. How and by whom civilized, 4, 5. Their government, 7. Kings, 8, & ſeq. Their reſentment againſt their monarch's perfidy, 14, 425. Beaten by the Spartans, 504. By the Romans, 663, & ſeq.

——— women great warriors, 5.

Arcas, the ſuppoſed founder of the Arcadian kingdom, 3.

——— 4th king of Arcadia, 10.

Archelaus, king of Lacedæmon, 381, & ſeq.

Archias betrays Thebes to the Lacedæmonians, 497.

Archidamia's noble ſpeech to the Spartans, 514. Baſely murdered by Amphares, 526.

Archidamus, king of Sparta, made general of the Peloponneſians, 266, & ſeq. Attempts Platea, 271. Waſtes Attica, 273, 458. His lucky ſtratagem to ſave his citizens, 453. Takes Platea, 458. His death, ibid.

——— the ſon of Ageſilaus, invades Arcadia, 504. Gains a noble victory, 505. Succeeds his father, 508. Dies in Italy, 510.

——— the ſon of Eudamidas, king of Sparta, 513.

——— IV. his character and reign, 518.

Archons, the firſt magiſtrates of Athens, 89. Liſt of thoſe mentioned in hiſtory, 91, & ſeq. Made decemnial, 89. Annual, ibid. Solon's laws concerning them, 122. By whom choſen, and how, 96, 141. Their oath, ibid. Office, ibid.

Arcon, prætor of Achaia, a friend to the Macedonians, 644. Declares for the Romans, ibid.

Areopagus, the great court of, at Athens, 98. By whom inſtituted, 116 119. Their power, ibid. & ſeq. Diminiſhed by Pericles. Why, 140, 141.

Arethuſa, the fable of, 69, n.

Areus, king of Sparta, oppoſed by his uncle, 513. Invaded by Pyrrhus, ibid. & ſeq. Drives him out of Sparta, 517. His death, ibid. Letter to the Maccabees, ibid. n.

——— the Spartan deputy condemned by the Achæans, 632. Acquitted by the Romans, 633.

Argalus, king of Lacedæmon, 56.

Argives, ancient Grecians, the only ones who came not to the Peloponneſian war, 263. League with Athens, 290, & 291, n. Defeated by the Spartans, 294. Renew their league with Athens, ibid. Break it, and are defeated by them, 346. By the Spartans, 382, 430, 434, n. Invaded by them, 462, 463, Beaten at Mantinea, 463, 564. The reſt, vid. ſub Argos, in Vol. V.

——— Argive women, their valour againſt the Spartans, 434, 335, n.

Argo ſhip, where built, 17.

Argonautic expedition, 19, 20, & n.

Argonauts, their exploits before they arrived at Colchis, 19, 20, & n. Their adventures at Colchis, ibid. & ſeq. In their return, 22, & ſeq. & n.

Argos, city of, taken by the Lacedæmonians, 532. By Philip, 542, 614. Given to Nabis, ibid.

Ariſtagoras's attmept to corrupt the Lacedæmonians, 438, n. & ſeq. n.

Ariſtides, general of the Perſians, 179 & ſeq. His character, 192. Baniſhed, 195, & ſeq. His piety, ibid. Moderation on his recal, 199. Reconciled with Themiſtocles, 203, 204. His bravery againſt the Perſians, 210. Choſen commander, 216. Regulator of the general tax, 217, 218. His character and death, 231, n. & ſeq n.

Ariſto, king of Sparta, 428. His character, 429.

Ariſtocrates I. king of Arcadia, ſtoned for his ſacrilege, 14.

——— II. ſtoned for his perfidy to the Meſſenians, 14, & ſeq. 425. Monument erected, with an inſcription to perpetuate his infamy, ibid.

Ariſtodemus choſen general of Sparta, 491. Beats the confederates at Corinth, ibid.

Ariſtodemus rips open his own daughter, 409. Choſen king of Meſſenia, 410. Defeats the Spartans, 413, 414. Kills himſelf, 414.

Ariſtodemus, prince of Megalopolis, enemy to the Lacedæmonians, kills Hipparchus, 165.

Ariſtogiton, his revenge againſt Hippias, 169.

Ariſtomenes choſen king of Meſſenia, 418 His character, ibid. Defeats the Lacedæmonians, 419. Betrayed by the Arcadians, 420, & ſeq. Harraſſes the Spartans, 421. Taken priſoner, 422. His wonderful eſcape, ibid. & ſeq. His death, 426, & n.

kén

Ariſtonica, prieſteſs of Delphos, prophecy againſt the Athenians, 197.

Arne, Bœotians driven out of it by the Theſſalians, 25, & n. & ſeq.

Artaphernes, Perſian general againſt the Athenians, 178. Eſpouſes Hippias, and would force the Athenians to receive him, ibid.

Artayctes, impaled for ſacrilege, 221.

Arts, diſcouraged by the Spartans, 390.

Aſpaſia, Pericles's miſtreſs, her character, 248, & n. Accuſed of impiety, 257, & 258, n. Acquitted, 259.

Aſtyochus reveals the treachery of the Athenian general, 306.

Atalanta's bravery in hunting the Calydonian boar, 77, & n.

Athens, deſcribed, 127, & ſeq. Its various fates, 131, n. Government after Solon, 134, 135, & ſeq. Deſtroyed by Mardonius, 210. Rebuilt by Conon, 337. Fortified, 213, 214, & ſeq. Twice attempttempted by the Peloponneſians, 317, 318, & ſeq. Taken by the Lacedæmonians, 322, & ſeq. Garriſoned by the Macedonians, 365, & ſeq. By Caſander, 371.

Athenians, their ſtate under their archons, 89, & ſeq. Cylon's inſurrection puniſhed, 100, & ſeq. Driven out of Salamis by the Megarenſians, 102. Expiated by Epimenides, ibid. Recover Salamis, 106, & ſeq. Divided into three parties, 131. Settled into orders by Solon, 132, & ſeq. Altered, ibid. Sparing of their freedom, 135, n. Their magiſtrates, 134, & ſeq. Inferior courts, 144, & ſeq. Enſlaved by Piſiſtratus, 151, & ſeq. Vainly try to dethrone him, 156, & ſeq. Their great veneration to his memory, 166. Turned into the greateſt deteſtation, 170. Their tribes increaſed from four to ten, 171. Invaded by the Lacedæmonians, ibid & ſeq, & 456. Defeat the Bœotians and Chalcidians, 173. War againſt the Ægineans, 174, & ſeq. Invaded and diſtreſſed by Darius, 178, & ſeq. Gain a compleat victory over him by ſea and land, 182, 183. Prepare againſt Xerxes, 196. Forſake their city and country, 199. Defeat the Perſian fleet, 204, & ſeq. Courted by Xerxes, 207, & ſeq. Acquire the ſovereignty of the ſea, 204. Reduce the Thaſians, 216. Aſſiſt the revolted Egyptians and Lacedæmonians, 229. Defeat the Ægineans, and Corinthians, &c. 234, 235. At Tanagra, 235, & ſeq. Totally defeat the Thebans, &c. 237, & ſeq. Make an advantageous peace with Perſia, 240. Defeated in Bœotia, 244, & ſeq. Make a truce with the Lacedæmonians, ibid. A true pole of the Athenian citizens, 245. Send a colony into Sybaris, ibid. The cauſes of the Samian war, 247. Beſiege and take Samos, 251, & ſeq. Aſſiſt the Corcyreans, 254, & ſeq. Gain a doubtful victory over the Corinthians, 255. Engage in the Peloponneſian war, 264. Their fleet againſt the Greeks, ibid. Viſited with a grievous plague, 266, 269, 277. Aſſiſt the Leontines in Sicily, 277. Take the iſland of Sphacteria, 281. Defeated in Bœotia, 285. Make a truce with the Lacedæmonians, 286. Peace with them, 287, & ſeq. A league with the Argives, 290, & 291, n. Beaten by the Lacedæmonians, 293, & ſeq. War againſt Perdiccas, 294. Send a fleet into Sicily, 297. Which is totally deſtroyed, 302, & ſeq. New war with Sparta, 304. Eſtabliſh an oligarchy, 307, & ſeq. Oppoſed by the army, 310, & ſeq. Beaten at ſea, 313. Defeat the Peloponneſians at Samos, 314. Gain a double victory, 315, 316. A third at Samos, 318, & ſeq. Their ingratitude to their victorious generals, 319, & ſeq. Beaten by Lyſander, 321. Reduced ibid. & ſeq. Fall under the government of thirty tyrants, 322. Reſcued by Thraſybulus, 325. Make peace with the Lacedæmonians, 326, & ſeq. A new peace with them and Perſia, 341. Declare war againſt the former, 342, & ſeq. Defeat them at ſea, 344. Make a new peace with them, 346. Succour them againſt the Thebans, ibid. & ſeq. League with the Arcadians, ibid. The Macedonian war, 347, & ſeq. Make peace with the revolted confederates, 250. Aſſiſt the Phocians againſt the holy league, ibid. & ſeq. Defeated and ſubdued by king Philip, 359, & ſeq. Make great rejoicings at his death, 361. Renew the war againſt the Macedonians after Alexander's death, 364, & ſeq. Make a ſubmiſſive peace with Antipater, 365. Their baſe ingratitude to Phocion, 369. Decree him a braſs ſtatue, 370. Reduced by Caſſander, 371. Their abominable flattery to Antigonus, &c. 372, & ſeq. Ingratitude to Demetrius Phalereus, ibid. And to the ſon of Antigonus, 374, & ſeq. To Aratus, 377. Reſtored to their liberty by him, ibid.

Athenian citizens, how admitted, 132, & 133, n. & ſeq. n.

Atimos infamy, a puniſhment at Athens, 121.

Attalus, king of Pergamus, joins with the Ætolians and Romans againſt the Acheans, 604, & ſeq. Takes Opus, 606. Forced to quit it, ibid. Invaded by king Philip, 610.

Attica, invaded and ſacked by the Perſians, 178. Its pre-eminence at ſea, 216.

Forſaken

Forſaken and ravaged by the Perſians, 199. Invaded by the Peloponneſians, 264 & ſeq. The reſt, Vide ſub Athens and Athenians.

Auge, princeſs of Arcadia, put to death, 11, & n.

Augeus, king of Elis, his famous ſtable cleanſed by Hercules, 68. That fable explained, 71. Outed his kingdom by Hercules, ibid. & ſeq. His end, 72.

Aurelius Oreſtes, Roman deputy, his haughty ſpeech to the Achæans, 656, & ſeq. Inrages them againſt the Romans, 657, & ſeq.

Auteſion, king of Thebes, runs mad, 671.

Autochthon, what, 3. The ſecond order of the Athenian citizens, 132.

Axius, river, in Theſſaly, 16.

Axones, who they were, 126.

Azan, king of Arcadia, the ſon of Arcas, 10.

Azania, the portion of Azan, ibid.

B.

Bacchiadæ, kings of Corinth, whence ſo called, 39. Seize on the Corinthian government, ibid. & ſeq

Bacchus, how worſhipped at Elis, 67, & n.

Baſileus, the ſecond magiſtrate of Athens, 90. His office, 142.

Baſilipotamo, or royal river. Vide Eurotas, 46.

Baſiliſſa, who, 142.

Battus, cured of his ſtammering, 19, n.

Beans, how uſed in voting, 136.

Bellerophon, why ſo called, 42. Subdues the Solymi, 43. And Amazons, 44. Succeeds Iobates in Lycia, ibid. His fatal end, ibid. Why ſaid to kill the Chimæra, 43, & n.

Bias, fetches Iphiclus's oxen out of Theſſaly, 18, n.

Bium, a city of Doris, 85.

Boar Calydonian, hunted, 77, n. Monſtrous tuſks, ibid.

Bœotia, invaded and plundered by the Athenians, 237, & ſeq. By the Lacedæmonians, 499, & ſeq.

Bœotian war, 499, & ſeq.

Bœotians, make a vain effort to eſtabliſh a democracy, 285. Refuſe the Nician peace, 287. Invite Philip of Macedon into Greece, 356. Join the Athenians againſt him, 359.

Braſidas, general of Sparta, ſent to aſſiſt Megara, 284. Sent into Macedon, 285. His ſucceſs in Thrace, ibid. & ſeq. In Attica, 479. Mortally wounded, 287. His character, 459.

Braſs, Corinthian, 669, & n.

Brides, Solon's laws concerning them, 118.

Butes burns the city of Eion, and himſelf in it, 225.

Byzantines beaten and fined by the Athenians, 314. Enter into a confederacy againſt them, 348. Beſieged by Philip, 357. Relieved by Phocion, 358.

Byzantium betrayed to the Athenians, 318.

C.

Cainon, the Athenian court, its office, 145.

Caliſto, daughter of Lycaon, deflowered by Jupiter, 10, & ſeq. The fable of her, ibid.

Calixenus ſtarved to death at Athens, 320.

Callias branded for his cruel avarice, 186, 187.

——— general of Athens, killed at the ſiege of Potidea, 256.

Callicrates, Achæan deputy's treachery to his country, 640. Choſen prætor, 642. A ſlave to the Romans, ibid. Informs againſt all his rivals, 648. Deteſted by his countrymen, 650.

Callicratidas, Spartan general, his ſucceſs againſt the Athenians, 469, & ſeq. Slain, ibid.

Callimachus, AthenianPolemarchus, killed at Marathon, 183.

Caliſtratus, Athenian General, his character, 343.

Calydon, a city of Ætolia, 77, 78.

——— the foreſt of, ibid.

Caſſander, ſon of Antipater, obſtructed by Polyperchon, 369. Subdues the Athenians, 370, & ſeq. Defeated by Demetrius, 373.

Caſtor and Pollux, their fabulous original, 58, n. Bring their ſiſter out of Aphidne, 59. Their other exploits and death, ibid. & ſeq. & n.

Cato's pleaſant ſpeech to the ſenate in favour of the Achæans, 652.

Cauloniates join in the Achæan league, 552.

Cecropes, the firſt tribe of citizens at Athens, 132.

Celibacy, how puniſhed by the Spartans, 385.

Cencherea, one of the two ſea-ports of Corinth, 36, & n.

Centaurs, whence the fable of them, 18, & n. Their luſtful attempt, ibid.

Cephalenia taken by the Athenians, 265. By the Romans, 627.

Cephiſus, river in Phocis, 29.

Ceramicus at Athens, 129.
Cerberus fetch'd out of hell by Hercules, 48, n.
Ceres civilizes the Athenians, 56, n. & seq. n.
——— her statue in Arcadia burnt, 13.
Chabrias, Athenian general, his character, 343. Opposes the Spartans in Bœotia, ibid. Defeats them at Naxus, 344. Slain in Thrace, ibid. His brave death and character, 348.
Chalcaspides, whence so called, 578.
Chares, Athenian general, expedition of Chios, 348. Repulsed by the Byzantines, 357.
Charilaus, king of Sparta, his birth, 379, 380. Discomfited by the Tegean women, 14, 401, 402. His reign and character, 381.
Chelonis, her filial diety, 522. Conjugal, ibid.
Children, Solon's laws concerning them, 123.
Chios, revolts from the Athenians, 305, Makes a fresh confederacy against them, 348.
Chlorians, outwitted by Sous, king of Sparta, 63, 64.
Cimon chosen admiral of Athens, 224. His character, ibid. & seq. Conquests in Cyrus, 226, & seq. Reduces Chersonesus and the Thasians, 227, & seq. Assists the Lacedæmonians, 229, 454. Tryed for treason, 233, & seq. Banished into Cyprus, 234. His service repulsed by the Athenian general, 236. Recalled, 239. Makes a descent into Cyprus, ibid. His death and character, 240, & 241, n.
Cinado's conspiracy discovered, 482 & n. & seq. n.
Cissidas, general of the Gauls, assists the Spartans, 504.
Citizens Athenian, Solon's laws concerning them, 122. Very few in Athens, 133. How admitted, 132.
——— of Sparta, their number, &c. 384.
Cleombrotus, king of Sparta, 497. Invades Bœotia, 500. Slain at Leuctra, 501.
——— II. deposes and succeeds Leonidas, 522. Banished, 523.
Cleomenes I. king of Lacedæmon, invades Athens, 171.
——— II. his character, 430. War with the Argives, ibid. & seq. His interview with Aristagoras, 432, & 437, n. & seq. n. Runs mad, 433. Kills himself. 176, 433, &c.
——— the son of Leonidas, 527. Opposes the Achæans, ibid. Restored the Spartan glory, ibid. & seq. Kills the ephori, 528. Invades Achaia, 531. Takes Argos, 532. Megalopolis, 533. Harrasseth Antigonus, ibid. Defeated by him, ibid. His sad end, 534. Vindicated against Polybius, &c. 534, n. & seq. n.
——— general of the Peloponnesian descent into Attica, 274.
Cleomenic war, the cause of it, 562, & n. The success of it, ibid. & seq.
Cleon, an Athenian orator, sent to take Sphacteria, 280. Makes a descent into Thrace, 287. Defeated and killed by Brasidas, ibid & 459.
Cleondrides's treachary punished with death, 456.
Cleonymus cabals against his nephew Areus, 513.
Cleophon assassinated at Athens, 320.
Clinias, king of Sicyon, killed, 554, n.
Clitor, king of Arcadia, 10
Clysthenes, head of the Alcmænian faction, 171. Banished, ibid.
Clytemnestra, her fabulous birth, 58, n.
Coin of Iron, invented by the Lacedæmonians, 392.
Conon succeeds Alcibiades, 319. Is victorious, ibid. Beats the Lacedæmonians, 320. Engages the Persians on the side of the Athenians, 336. His success in it, ibid. & seq. Defeated by Lysander, 470. Returns to and rebuilds Athens, 337.
Coos, confederates against Athens, 348.
Corcyra, invaded by the Corinthians, 254. The dreadful sedition of 275, & seq. & 281.
Corcyreans, a colony of Corinth, 253. Their war with the Epidamnians, ibid & seq. Treachery to the Athenians and Lacedæmonians, ibid.
Corinth, described, 34. When and by whom founded, 39. Subdued by the Heraclidæ, ibid. The whole duration of its government, 41. The kings, ibid. & seq.
Corinth, the city of, by whom built, 34. Why so called, 35. Why called Heliopolis, ibid. Described, 36. Its situation, opulence, &c. ibid. Buildings, 37, & seq. Besieged by Agesilaus, 493. Surprised by Aratus, 555. Accedes to the Achæan league, ibid. & seq. Taken and burnt by the Romans, 669, & seq.
Corinthian order, whence so called, 37.
——— metal 669, & n.
Corinthians given to traffic, 36, 38. Their character, antiquity, government, and kings, ibid. & seq. Subdued by the Dores, 45. Invade Corcyra, 254. Engage them at sea, 255. Their politic treatment of their prisoners, 276, & seq. Refuse the Nician peace, 287 Join with the Achæans, 555, & seq. Affront the Roman deputies, 661. Subdued and sold for slaves, 669, &se.
Corinthus, whose son he was, 35, & n.
Cowardice, how punished by the Athenians, 122.

Crateſiclea, queen of Sparta, her love to her country, 528, 532.
Creon, the ſame with Glaucus, 42, & n.
—— the firſt archon at Athens, 90.
Cretan laws and polity, 380.
Critias, one of the thirty tyrants of Athens, 323. His treachery to Theramenes, ibid. To Alcibiades, 328, n.
Critolaus, Achæan pretor, inflames the people againſt Rome, 659, & ſeq. Declares war againſt them, &c. 663. Defeated and killed by Metellus, ibid.
Crotoniates embrace the Achæan league, 552.
Cryptia, a barbarous Spartan cuſtom, 396, & n
Curetes, Pleuronians ſo called, 79.
Cyllene mount in Arcadia, 10.
Cylon's inſurrection at Athens, 100, &ſeq.
Cynegyrus, the Athenian, his ſignal bravery, 183.
Cynics, whence ſo called, 130.
Cynorta, king of Lacedæmon, 56.
Cynoſarges at Athens, what, 130.
Cynoſureans, a colony of the Argives, 64. Baniſhed by the Lacedæmonians, ibid.
Cypſelus, king of Arcadia, kills the tyrant of Mycena, 13.
—— a Lapitha, becomes king of Corinth, 40, & ſeq. & 41, n.
Cyrbes, what, 126.
Cyrene, raviſhed by Jupiter, 19, & n.
—— the fountain of ibid.
Cyrrha, the ſea-port of Delphos, 33. Its territories invaded by the Phocians, 30, & ſeq.
Cyrrheans attempt Delphos, puniſhed, 109, & ſeq.
Cythæron mount in Phocis, 29.
Cythera, iſland, taken by the Athenians, 282, & ſeq. Filled with Meſſenians, 458.

D.

DAduchi, their dignity, 186.
Damaratus, king of Sparta, 430. Depoſed by his collegue, 431. Retires into Perſia, ibid. Sends notice to Sparta of the deſigns of Xerxes, 436. His anſwer to Xerxes. 439.
Damocles's ſurprizing chaſtity, 373, 374.
Dardanians invade Maeedon. 605.
Daulian women unnatural repaſt, 33, n.
Daulis, a city in Phocis, 33. Remarkable for its tall and ſtout inhabitants, ibid.
Decelea, the caſtle of, ſeized by the Lacedæmonians, 300. Fortified, ibid
Dejanira princeſs of Scyrus, debauched by Achilles, 25.
—— the daughter of OEneus, married to Hercules, 77. Her fatal jealouſy and death, 57, 58, n.
Delium, the battle of, 285.
Delos, treaſure plundered by Pericles, 272.
Delphi, or Delphos, the city of, deſcribed, 29, & ſeq. Its immenſe riches, 30.
—— the oracle of. how diſcovered, 30. and temple of, deſcribed, 29, & ſeq.
—— beſieged by the Cyrreans, 109. Defended by all the Greeks, ibid.
Delphinium, a criminal court at Athens, 144.
Demades, his bold ſpeech to Philip, 360, He and his ſon put to death by Antipater, 368, 369.
Demarchi of Athens, their office, 143.
Demetrias, a city in Theſſaly, 17.
Demetrius Phalereus made governor of Athens, 371. His great kindneſs to the Athenians, ibid. Ungratefully put to death, 372. & ſeq —— Poliorcetes invades Athens, 371. Deified by the Athenians, 372. Initiated in the myſteries of Ceres, 374 Forced out of Greece, ibid. Repulſed by the Athenians, ibid. His generoſity to them, 375. His attempt againſt Sparta, 519.
Democritus, prætor of Achaia, invades Sparta, 655.
Demoi at Athens, what, 132.
Demophon, king of Corinth, 44.
Demoſthenes made admiral of Athens, 278. Fortifies the promontory of Pylus, 279. Defeated at Delium, 285. Sent into Sicily, 300. Taken priſoner by the Syracuſians, 302. Put to death, 303.
—— the orator, his character, &c. 351, 352. His firſt Philippics, 353. Cowardly flight at the battle of Chæronea, 359. Demanded to be delivered up by Alexander, 362. Fined and impriſoned for bribery, 363. Flies to Ægina, ibid. Poiſons himſelf, 366. His character and writings, ibid. n &ſeq. n.
Dercyllidas, general of Lacedæmon, his ſucceſs againſt the Perſians, 481.
—— noble ſpeech to Pyrrhus, 513.
Deucalion, king of Phthia, 15. Saved from the flood on Parnaſſus, 29.
Diacrii, one of the three contending parties at Athens, 111.
Diæus, Achæan prætor raiſes new troubles in Achaia, 654, & ſeq. Inflames the Achæans againſt Rome, 659, & ſeq. Aſſumes the government of Achaia, 663. His edict to the Achæan cities, ibid. Cruelties, 665. Raſh confidence, 666, 667. Defeated by Mummius, ibid. & ſeq His deſperate end, 667.
Diana, Hymnia, worſhipped by the Arcadians, 14.
Diaſia, a feaſt of the Athenians, 101.
Dinocrates, head of the Meſſenian rebels, 634. Beats the Achæans, ibid. Kills himſelf, 637.

Diomedon unjuſtly put to death, 320, & ſeq. His ſpeech to the Athenians, ibid.

Diophanes, Achæan prætor, invades Meſſene, 625. Elis, ibid. Recalled by Flamminius, ibid.

Diopithes's oracle againſt Sparta, 478, & n.

Dodona, the temple of plundered and burnt, 578.

Dolopes, where ſituate, 16.

Donetz, or Little Tanais river, 443.

Dorians, where ſituate, 83, & ſeq. Invade Peloponneſus, 84.

Doric dialect and order, 84, & n.

——— faction in Sicily, 277.

Doridas, king of Corinth, invaded by the Dores, 45.

Dorimachus, a famous Ætolian robber, 572. Invades Epirus, 578. Theſſaly, 588.

Doris, its ſituation, names, &c. 83, & ſeq. Invaded by the Phocians, 454.

——— the metropolis of the Dorians, by whom built, 84.

Doryſſus, king of Lacedæmon, 65.

Draco, archon of Athens, gives that city a body of laws, 97. His character and death. ibid. His laws abrogated by Solon, 115.

Dreſs, how regulated by Lycurgus, 387.

Drunkenneſs, abhorred by the Lacedæmonians, 387

Dryopes, where ſituate, &c. 84, & n.

Dulichium, iſland of 73, & n.

E.

EArthquakes in Greece, ſuſpend the Peloponneſian war, 277, 278.

Eating, how regulated by Lycurgus, 386.

Echemus, king of Arcadia, aſſiſts Atreus againſt the Heraclidæ, 11.

Echmis, king of Arcadia, aſſiſts the Meſſenians againſt the Lacedæmonians, 14.

Eccleſia, the grand court of Athens, 134. Its power, 135.

Egiſtines, of Sicily, ſuccoured by the Athenians, 295 & ſeq.

Elatea, taken by king Philip, 358.

Elatus, the prince of Arcadia, ſettles in Phocis, 10. Founder of Elatea, 32.

Eleans league with the Athenians, 290, & 291, n. Quarrel with the Lacedæmonians, 461. Invaded by them, 465. make peace with them, ibid.

Eleus, king of Elis, gives name to that kingdom, 71, & n.

Eleuſians, murdered by the 30 tyrants, 325.

Elis, kingdom, ſo named from Eliſha, 66. Its ſituation and extent, ibid. By whom founded, 70. Kings, &c, ibid. & ſeq. Ruined by war and peſtilence, 74.

——— the metropolis of that kingdom, 97.

Elpinice, ſiſter and concubine of Cimon, 189, & 241, n. Her brave ſpeech to Pericles, 252.

Empiramus, takes Era by treachery, 424

Endius, Lacedæm. Propoſal for peace rejected by the Athenians, 316.

Endymion, king of Elis, 70. The fable of him, ibid.

Epaminondas, oppoſes the Spartans in Bœotia, 499. Defeats them, 500, & ſeq. Invades Laconia, 502. Rebuilds Meſſene, 503. Breaks into Peloponneſus, 504. Fruſtrated in his attempt againſt Sparta, 506. Againſt Mantinea, ibid. Beats the Lacedæmonians but ſlain, ibid. & ſeq.

Epeus, king of Elis, the ſuppoſed contriver of the Trojan horſe, 70.

Ephetæ, the court of, their power, &c. 98, 116.

Ephialtes head of an Athenian party, 230. His character, ibid. & ſeq. Aſſaſſinated, 234.

Ephira or Ephyra in Epirus, ancient name of Corinth, 34.

Ephori of Sparta, by whom inſtituted, 411, & 412, n. Their office, &c. ibid. Become tyrants, 527, & 528, n. Murdered, 539.

Epichnemidia, whence ſo called, 82. Where ſituate, ibid.

Epidamnians, a colony of Corinth, 253. Aſſiſted by them, ibid. & ſeq.

Epidaurus, a famous ſea port in Lacedæmon, 49. Invaded by the Athenians, 294.

Epimenides, a great diviner, expiates the Athenians, &c. 102.

Epiſtates, his office at Athens, 136.

Epizelus, a ſtrange ſtory of him, 184.

Eponymos, the archon of Athens, why ſo called 141.

Epytus, I. king of Arcadia, bit to death by a Viper, 11.

——— II. ſtruck blind for his preſumption, 12.

Era, fortified by the Meſſenians, 421. Beſieged by the Lacedæmonians, ibid. Betrayed by them, 423, & ſeq.

Erato, a nymph, mother of Azan king of Arcadia, 10.

Eretria, taken and deſtroyed by the Perſians, 179.

Eretrian priſoners, betray the Athenians, 312.
Ergatai, Athenian Craftmen, ſo called, 132.
Erigon, river in Theſſaly, 16.
Erineus, a city of the Dorians, 85.
Eſtates, law at Athens againſt diſſipating them, 121.
Eubœa, invaded by the Athenians, 173. Perſians, 178. Athenians, 244. Revolts from them, 313. Joined to Bœotia by an iſthmus, 315. Taken by the Spartans, 478.
Euclidas, defeated at Salaſia, 570.
Eudamidas, prince of Sparta's ill ſucceſs in Thrace, 497. Succeeds Agis, 512.
Evenus, river of Ætolia, 75, & ſeq.
Evephnus's treachery, cauſes the Meſſenian war, 403.
Eumenes's alliance rejected by the Achæans, 630.
Eunonus, king of Lacedæmon, 65, Killed, ibid.
Euphaes, king of Meſſenia, invaded by the Spartans, 405, & ſeq. His death, 410.
Euratus, Achæan deputy's ſpeech to the Roman ſenate, 650.
Eutotas, founder of Lacedæmon, 46.
—— a famous river of Sparta, 48.
Euribiades, Spartan admiral, ſurprizes the Perſian fleet, 443. Obtains the prize of valour for the victory at Salamis, 207.
Eurycrates I. king of Sparta, 416.
—— II. 247.
Eurymedon, Athenian general ſent into Sicily, 284. Slain at Syracuſe, 301.
Euryſthenes, and Procles, joint kings of Lacedæmon, 51.
Eurythus, king Oechalia, robbed of his horſes by Hercules, 56.
—— a blind Spartan, his brave death, 443, n.
Eurypontidæ, } whence ſo called, 64.
Eurytionidæ, }
Exerciſes in Sparta, how regulated, 391, & ſeq.
Expiations, to whom aſcribed, 103, n. How performed, ibid. n. & ſeq. n.

F.

FEaſts and public meals, by whom regulated, 142.
Flaminius Quinct. Roman general ſent againſt the Spartan tyrant, 542. Treats with him, 544. Brings the Achæans over to the Romans, 611. Makes a vain attempt on Corinth, 613. A ſhameful alliance with Nabis, 615. Peace with Macedon, 617. Cauſes the univerſal freedom of Greece to be proclaimed, 618. Withdraws his Roman gariſon, 619. Returns to Rome, ibid. His ſpeech to the Achæans about Zacynthus, 626.
Fleece, golden, what, 20, n. 23, n. 24, n.
Flutes, a martial inſtrument of Greeks, 63.
Fortune, the temple of, at Elis, 67.
Fountain of the Horſe, Vide Pegaſus, 34.
Funerals, Solon's laws concerning them, 122. How performed to the ſlain at Athens, 265. How regulated by Lycurgus, 384.

G.

GEorgoi, Athenian farmers ſo called, 132.
Glauce, the fountain, why ſo called, 42.
Glaucus, king of Corinth, 42.
Gneſios, among the Athenians, what, 132.
Gold mines ſeized by the Thaſians, 227, & ſeq.
—— fleece. Vide Fleece, 20, n. 22, n. 23, n.
Gorgo, queen of Sparta, her character, 437, n.
Gorgophone, daughter of Perſeus, married Oebalus, king of Lacedæmonia, 56.
Gorgopus, Spartan general, beaten and killed in Ægina, 340.
Greece, contended for by the gods, 35, & n. The reſt vide ſub Greeks.
Greece, the ſtates of, engage in the Peloponneſian war, 263, & ſeq. Viſited with dreadful earthquakes, 277, & ſeq. The Nician peace, 287. New diſorders after it, 238. Divided between ariſtocracy and oligarchy, 345. Its various ſtates after the Achæan league, 346. Makes a new peace, ibid. Throws off the Macedonian yoke after Philip's death, 361. And after that of Alexander, 364, & ſeq.
Guardians, Solon's laws concerning them, 121.
Gylippus, general of Sparta, relieves Syracuſe, 300. His ſucceſs in Sicily, 466. Takes the Athenian generals priſoners, 302. Whether chargeable with their death, 303, n. Baniſhed for theft, 472. His character, ibid.
Gylus, ſlain by the Locrians, 492.
Gythians, ſubdued by the Lacedæmonians, 47, 48.
Gythium, a ſea-port of Lacedæmon, 48. By whom built, ibid. & n. Taken and burnt by the Athenians, 238. By Nabis, 545.

H.

HArmolycus, an Athenian, his bravery againſt the Perſians, 210.
Harpalus, bribes the Athenians to protect him, 363.
Harpyes, a fabulous kind of birds, 21, n.
Hecatomphonia, what, 423.
Hegeſandrides takes Eubæa, 468.
Heireſſes, Solon's laws concerning them, 117.
Helen, the fatal Grecian beauty, her fabulous birth, 58, n.
Heliæa, court at Athens, 145, & ſeq.
Helice, metropolis of Achaia Propria, 88.
Helicon, mountain in Phocis, 29.
Heliopolis, a name given to ſeveral Greek cities, 25, & n.
Heliots, or Helotes, enſlaved by the Lacedæmonians, 47, 48. Their grievous puniſhment, 49, & n. Miſerable ſlavery, 396, n. & ſeq. n. Rebellion, 453. Butchered by Nabis, 543.
Hellas, Elis, whence ſo called, 66.
Heraclea a city in Theſſaly, 657, n. Beſieged by the Achæans, 662.
Heraclidæ, ſubdue the Corinthians, 39. And the whole peninſula, ibid. ſeq.
Hercules, loſes his boy Hylas in the Argonautic expedition, 20, n. His revenge againſt the king of OEchalia, 56. Againſt Hippocoon, king of Sparta, 57. Leaves that Kingdom in truſt of Tyndareus, ibid. Kills the ſons of Actor, and dethrones Augeas, 72. His laſt exploits and death, 57, 58, & n.
Hermæ of Athens, defaced in one night, 296.
Heſteia, in Eubœa taken by the Athenians, 244.
Hippadatelontes, ſecond rank of Athenians, 115.
Hipparchus, the ſon of Piſiſtratus, 161. His reign and character, 162, & ſeq. Killed by Harmodius, 165.
Hippias, the ſon of Piſiſtratus, 161. Whether the eldeſt, ibid. His cruel reign, 167, & ſeq. Expelled, 168, & ſeq Retires to Sigeum, 175. Cabals with the Perſians, 177. His dream and death, 184, 185, & n.
Hippocoon, king of Lacedæmon, killed by Hercules, 56, & ſeq.
Hippocrates, the father of Piſiſtratus, 162.
Hippothous, king of Arcadia, 12.
Homer's writings found by Lycurgus, 381.
Horſes, in Theſſaly, 18.
Hyampolis, the battle of, 27.
Hyanthidas, king of Corinth, invaded by the Dores, 45.
Hypatha, metropolis of Theſſaly, 17.

I.

JAſon ſent to fetch the golden fleece, 20, Aſſiſted by Medea, 22, Gets it from Æetes, ibid. Baniſhed Theſſaly by Pelias's ſon, 24. Goes to Corinth, 42. Marries Glauce, ibid. His death, ibid.
——— prince of Theſſaly aſſiſts the Thebans, 500.
Idmon, an Argonaut killed by a wild boar, 21, n.
Ino, her cruelty and fate, 37, 38, n.
Intaphernes, one of the ſeven Perſian conſpirators, 96, & ſeq. Put to death by Darius, 102.
Iole, princeſs of OEbalia, ſtolen by Hercules, 57, n. Given to his ſon Hyllus, 58, n.
Ion, ſucceeds Selinus in Ægialea, 86, Gives the name of Ionians to the Ægialeans, 87. His death, ibid.
Ionian faction in Sicily, 277.
Ionians, driven out of Achaia, 87, & ſeq. Retire into Attica, ibid.
Iphicrates, Athenian general, his character, 337. Succeeds Thraſybulus againſt Rhodes, 339. Falſely accuſed by the Perſian general, 345. Raiſes the ſiege of Corinth, 493.
Iphitus, prince of OEchalia, killed by Hercules, 56.
——— king of Elis, reſtorer of the Olympic games, 74.
Irens in Sparta, their office, 389.
Iſagoras, head of an Athenian faction, 171. Aſſiſted by the Lacedæmonians againſt his rival, ibid. & ſeq. Retires into the citadel of Athens, 172. Its beſieged and forced to ſurrender, ibid.
Iſthmian games, their origin, &c. 37, & n.
Iſtiæotis, part of Theſſaly, 15.
Ithome built and fortified, 407. Taken by the Lacedæmonians, 415. Seized by the Helotes, 454.
Julius Sextus, Roman deputy's ſpeech to the Achæans, 658, 659. Outwitted by Critolaus, ibid.

L.

LAbda, the mother of Cypſelus, ſaves him from the Bacchiadæ, 40, 41, n.
Labotas, king of Lacedæmon, wars againſt the Argives, 64.
Lacedæmon, the ſon of Eurotas, 46. The ſuppoſed ſon of Jupiter, ibid. & n.
Lacedæmonia, whence ſo called, 45, 46, Why called Hecatompolis, 47, n. Deſcribed, 47 & ſeq. Its government, duration, 51, &c. Kings, 55, & ſeq. Why afterwards called Egidæ and Eurytiontidæ, 64. The reſt, vid. ſub. Laconia, &c.

Lacedæmonians engage the ſtates of Greece againſt the Athenians, 263. Make a truce with them, 279. Freſh overtures of peace, 286 End in a truce, ibid. Followed by the Nician peace, 287. Break it, 288. Beaten by ſea and land, 315, 316. Reduce the Athenians, 321, & ſeq. Make peace with them, 341. Subdue the Thebans and other ſtates, ibid. Renew the war, 342, & ſeq. Defeated at Naxus, 344. At Leucades, ibid. Their kings from Lycurgus down to the Achæan league, 378, 379. War with the Meſſenians, 403, & ſeq. Argives, 408. Defeated by Ariſtodemus, 413, 414. By the Meſſenians, 419. Reduce them to ſlavery, 427. Defeated at Thermopylæ, 441, & n. Preparations againſt the Perſians, 444, & ſeq. Defeat them by ſea and land, 445, & ſeq. The Athenians, 470. Their decree againſt them, 471. War with Perſia, 480. Diſcover a conſpiracy, 482. Make a general peace, 495. Grow haughty by it, 496, & ſeq. Defeated by the Thebans at Leuctra, 500, 501. Defeat the Arcadians, 505. Thebans, 507. Suffered to alienate their lands, 520. Reſtored to their ancient government, 529, 530, & ſeq. Defeated by Antiochus at Selaſia, 533, & ſeq. Subdued by the Macedonians, 538. Chuſe two new kings, ibid. & ſeq. Defeated by the Achæans, 541. Inſlaved by Nabis, ibid. & ſeq. Plundered by the Ætolians, 548. Join with the Achæans, ibid. Go over to the Ætolians, 549. Make and break the peace with the Achæans, 599. Join with the Romans, ibid. Withdraw from the Achæan league, 627. Reduced by by Philopæmen, 629. Send deputies to the Roman ſenate, ibid. & ſeq. Reſtored to their laws, &c. 634. Complain to the Romans againſt the Achæans, 654. Reimburſed by order of the ſenate, 670.

Lacharis, ſeizes the ſovereignty of Athens, 375. Depoſed by Demetrius, ibid.

Laconia, the ancient name of Lacedæmon, 45. Its ſituation, extent, 47, & ſeq. Soil, &c. 50. Government under a monarchy, 51, & ſeq. Biarchy, 52. Invaded by the Athenians, 238. Divided by Lycurgus, 384. By the Helotes, 454. The reſt vid. ſub Lacedæmon.

Laconic ſtile, what, 390.

Lais, an extravagant Corinthian Harlot, 37, n.

Lajus, king of Elis, 74, & ſeq.

Lamachus, Athenian admiral, expedition againſt Heraclea, 285. Made Alcibiades's colleague in Sicily, 296. His character, 299. Killed at the ſiege of Syracuſe, ibid.

Lampſacum, taken from the Athenians, 321.

Lands, how divided by Lycurgus, 384.

Lapithæ, where ſituate, 16.

Lariſſa, a city in Theſſaly, 16. Gives the name of Lariſſæus to Achilles, ibid. & ſeq.

Las attempted by the Lacedæmonians, 627.

Laws, how enacted at Athens, 138.

Law-ſuits, how carried on at Athens, 144, & ſeq.

——— diſcouraged by Lycurgus, 393.

Leœna, Athenian courteſan's great conſtancy, 167, & ſeq.

Lecheum, one of the ſea-ports of Corinth, 36.

Leda, her fabulous offſpring, 58, n.

Lelex, founder of Lacedæmon, 46.

Lemnos, iſland in the Ægean ſea, inhabitanted by Amazons, 20, n. How taken by the Athenians, 191, n.

Leo, king of Sparta, 428.

Leonidas, king of Sparta, expedition againſt Xerxes, 437, & ſeq. His brave anſwer to Xerxes, 440. His gallant death, 441. His body abuſed by him, ibid.

——— II. introduces luxury into Sparta, 519. Depoſed, 522. Reſtored, 524.

Leontius, treachery to the Achæans, 587, To Aratus, 588. Forgiven, 590. Raiſes a tumult at Corinth, 591. Is put to death, 594.

Leoſthenes, general of the Greeks, defeates Antipater, 364. Killed at the ſiege of Lamia, 365.

Leotychides I. choſen king of Sparta, 176. Puts an end to the Perſian war, by a complete victory, 210, & ſeq.

——— II. raiſed to the crown of Sparta 431. Triumphs over the depoſed king, ibid. Victorious at Mycale, 448. Dies in exile, 453.

——— the ſon of Agis, owned by his father, 476. Excluded the ſucceſſion and his private eſtate, 480.

Leſbos, iſland, revolts from the Athenians, 273.

Leucopetra, the battle of, 666.

Leuctra, the battle of. 500.

Leuctrum, a city of Lacedæmonia, 50.

Liches, a noble Spartan, diſcovers and carries off Oreſtes's bones, 12, 13, n.

Lilea, a city in Doris, 85.

Locri, Ozolæ, Locri Epicnemidii, and Locri Epizephyrii, where ſituated, 82.

Locris, how divided, 82. Plundered by the Athenians, 238. Invaded by the Phocians, 488.

Lycæum, at Athens, 129.

Lyceuns, a mountain in Arcadia, 14. A famous pillar erected upon it, ibid.

Lycaon, why so called, 5. The fable of him, 6 n. Second king of Arcadia, 9, n. His numerous issue, ibid. & n. Cities built by them, ibid. n.

Lycomedes, general of Arcadia, killed, 502.

Lycortas, Achæan prætor's speech to the states, 631. Revenges Philopœmen's death, 637.

Lycosura, by whom built, 9.

Lycurgus, king of Arcadia, 11.

——— the famed Spartan lawgiver, refuses the crown, 53. 379. Retires into exile, ibid. New-models the government, 54, 381. His laws, 383. Approved by the Delphic oracle, 382. Why not written, 396. His death and honours, 399.

——— a private man chosen, king of Sparta, 539. Defeats the Messenians, ibid. Obliges the Macedonians to retire, 540. Withdraws into Ætolia, ibid.

——— Lacedæmonian general invades Messenia, 588.

Lycus, the court of, 145.

Lyncæus, the son of Aphareus, famed for his keen eyes, 60. Killed by Pollux, ibid.

Lysander, Spartan admiral, his character, 467. Victories, 319, & seq. Sets up thirty tyrants over Athens, 322, 471. Undermines Tissaphernes, 467. Attempts the sovereignty of Greece, 469. Defeats the Athenians at sea, 321, 470. Demolishes the walls of Athens, 471. Outwitted by Pharnabazus, 474, & seq. Accompanies Agesilaus into Asia, 482, & seq. Endeavours to raise an insurrection, 484, & 485, n. Sent against the Phocians, 489. Killed before Haliartus, ibid.

——— one of the Spartan Ephori, offers a rhetra for a new partition, 521. Rejected, ibid.

M.

Macedonian war, 347, & seq.

Macedonians, their war with the Athenians, 347, & seq. Divided into two factions after the death of Antipater, 369. The rest, vide sub Philip, &c.

Machanidas, seizes on the Spartan crown, 540. Defeated and killed by Philopœmen, 541.

Macra-Stoa, of Athens, 130.

Magnesia, part of Thessaly, 15.

Malea, a promontory of Lacedæmonia, 48.

Mantineans league with the Athenians, 290, & 291, n. Expelled their city by the Lacedæmonians, 496. Rebuild it, 502. Besieged by the Lacedemonians, ibid & seq.

Marathon, the famous battle of, described, 183, & seq.

Marcius, Roman consul, penetrates into Thessaly, 644. Forbids the Achæans to send succours to Appius, 645.

Mardonius's message to the Athenians rejected, 208, & seq. Defeated and killed by the Greeks, 210.

Marriages, how regulated by Lycurgus, 385.

Meander, a river in Phrygia, 497, 570.

Medea, daughter of Æetes, procures Jason the golden fleece, 22. Why supposed an inchantress, 20, n. & 22, n. Her cruelty to her brother, 22. Revenge on Pelias, 24. Banished to Corinth, ibid. The sad effects of her jealousy there, 42.

Megacles's severity against Cylon's confederates, 101. His party condemned for it, 111. Obliges Pisistratus to retire, 156. Joins with Pisistratus, ibid. & seq. Discomfited, 158.

Megalapolis built by the Arcadians, 502. Taken and ruined by Cleomenes, 566.

Megalopolitans, sent to beg Antigonus's assistance, 564.

Megapenthes king of Tyrin, 625. Exchanges it for Argos, 627.

——— a bastard son of Menelaus, king of Sparta, 61, 62. Dethroned by Orestes, 62.

Megara, revolts, 243. Besieged by the Athenians, 284, & seq. Relieved by the Laeedæmonians, ibid. Fortified by Phocion, 238. Taken by the Romans, 664.

Megareans outwitted by the Athenians, 107. Beaten out of Salamis by them, ibid. Revolt from them, 243. Join in the Peloponnesian war, 263. Reject the Nician peace, 487. Defended by the Athenians, 358. Subdued by the Romans, 664.

Meleager king of Calydon, his hunting the famous boar, 77, & n. Falls in love with and marries Atalanta, ibid. The fable of his birth, and death, 78, 79, n.

Melitus, the false accuser of Socrates, 331. Hated on that account by the Athenians, 335, 336, n.

Melos, island, taken by the Athenians, 295.

Menalcidas, why accused to the Romans, 653. Acquitted by Diæus, 654. Breaks the truce with Achaia, 656. Kills himself, ibid

Menelaus succeeds to the Lacedæmonian crown, 61, & seq.

Mercury, where born, 10, n.

Meſſenian war, the cauſe of it, 403. Second war, 418, & ſeq.
Metellus, Roman general, his good offices to the Achæans, 655. To the Lacedæmonians, 659. His deputies affronted by the Achæans, 661. Defeats them, 663. Takes Thebes, and Megara, 664. His offers of peace rejected, 665. Sent in to Macedon, 666.
Metoicoi, at Athens, what, 132,
Miltiades, Athenian general, defeats the Perſians with a ſmall army, 183, & ſeq. His ſpeech to Callimachus, 181, & ſeq. Unfortunate expedition againſt Paros, 188, & ſeq. His death and deſcent, 189, & n. & ſeq. n.
Mina, its value, 113.
Mindarus, Peloponneſian admiral, defeated and killed, 316, 468.
Minerva, her temple at Stymphalus, 4. At Tegea, 11. That of braſs built by Caſtor and Pollux, 59.
Minoas, iſland, taken by the Athenians, 275.
Mitylenians invaded by the Athenians, 274. Succoured by the Peloponneſians, ibid. Reduced, 275.
Money, deſpiſed by the Spartans, 392.
Morea, whence ſo called, 673.
Mortgages, how made among the Athenians, 113, 114.
Mourning, how regulated by Lycurgus, 384.
Mummius, Roman conſul, ſent againſt the Achæans, 664, & ſeq. Blockades Corinth, 666. Defeats the Achæans, 667. Takes and plunders Corinth, 668. His ill taſte of architecture, 669. Triumphs at Rome, 672.
Munichia, a ſea port in Attica, 130. A prophecy concerning it fulfilled, 103. Garriſoned by the Macedonians, 366. Taken by Demetrius Policertes, 372. Garriſoned by him, 376. Sold again to the Athenians, 377.
Munichian month, why changed, 372.
Murder, by whom cognizable at Athens, 140.
Muſæum, taken and garriſoned by Demetrius, 376. Re-ſold to the Athenians by Diogenes, 377, Muſic, admired by the Spartans, 391.
Mycale, the battle of, 210.
Mycena, Meſſania, invaded by the Lacedæmonians, 404, & ſeq. Subdued, 418, & ſeq. Recovered under Ariſtomenes, 419. Betrayed by Ariſtocrates, 420, & ſeq. Inſlaved by the Lacedæmonians, 429.
Mycenians, Meſſenians, expelled Peloponneſus 455. Rebel againſt the Achæans, 634. Rout them, ibid. & ſeq. Poiſon Philopœmen, 636. Puniſhed by his ſucceſſor, 637.
Myles, the ſon of Eurotas, 46.
Myrmidons, where ſituate, 16. Why ſo called, ibid.
Myronides defeats the Corinthians, 235. His bravery againſt the Thebans, 237, & ſeq.

N.

NAbis, tyrant of Sparta, his cruelty to the Lacedæmonians, 541, & ſeq. To the Argives, 615. Treachery to Philip, ibid. Defeated by the Achæans, 621, & ſeq. Takes Gythium, 622. Harraſſed by the Achæans, 623, & ſeq. Defeated, ibid. Aſſaſſinated by the Ætolians, 548.
Naupactus, taken by the Athenians, 238. Given to the Meſſenians, 455.
——— the peace of, 599.
Nectanebis, prince of Egypt, Aſſiſted by Ageſilaus, 509, n.
Nemea, a River in Peloponneſus, 616, & n.
Nephele, mountain in Theſſaly, inhabited by Centaurs, 16.
Neptune's famous temple at Corinth, 37, & ſeq. At Sparta in form of a grotto, 48, n. At Athens, 128.
Neſſus, the famous Centaur, killed by Hercules, 57, n. His revenge, ibid. & ſeq. n.
Nicander, king of Lacedæmonia, his reign, 404. Wars againſt the Meſſenians, ibid. & ſeq.
Nicanor, Caſſander's general over the Athenians, 369.
Nicias, Athenian general, his diſpute with Cleon, 280. Takes the iſland of Cythera, 283. Gives name to the Nician peace, 287. Oppoſes the deſcent into Sicily, 296. Sent general thither againſt his will, ibid. His ill ſucceſs at Syracuſe, 300, & ſeq. Forced to ſurrender to Gylippus, 302. Put to death by the Syracuſans, 303
Nicocles, tyrant of Sicyon, expelled, 554, n.
Nicodromus, Athenian general, invades Ægina, 176.
Nicomedes, Spartan general, brings the Phocians to reaſon, 455. Defeated at Tanagra, ibid.
Nicoſtratus, baſtard of Menelaus king of Lacedæmon, 62, ——— Achæan prætor, defeats the Macedonians at Argos, 616.
Niſea taken from the Athenians, 102. Re-taken and fortified, 275.
Nomothetæ, at Athens, their office, 143.
Nomophylaces, their office, ibid.
Nothos, among the Athenians, what, 132.
Nyctimus, king of Arcadia, 10.

Oaths,

O.

OAths, how taken by the Athenian magiſtrates, 141, 145, 146.

Oebalia, one of the ancient names of Lacedæmonia, 47, n. & 56.

Oebalus, a Spartan Tradeſman, ſets up one hundred Tripods at Ithome, 414.

Oibazus, killed by the Athenians, 212.

Olenus, in Achaia Propr. by whom founded, 86.

Olympia, a city of Elis, deſcribed, 68. Famed for the temple of Jupiter Olympius, ibid.

Olympiads, the computation of, 68, 69, & n.

Olympian temple at Athens, 129.

Olympic games, by whom inſtituted, 461, 462, n. Reſtored, 68. Deſcribed, ibid. & n. Forbid to the women, 69, n.

Olympus, mountain in Theſſaly, 16.

Olynthians ſubdued by Philip of Macedon, 356.

Olynthus, the republic of, why oppreſt by the Spartans, 496. Subdued by Polybiades, 498.

Onias, the Maccabee, Arius's letter to him, 517, & n.

Oplitai, Athenian ſoldiers, ſo called, 132,

Opoes, a city in Locris, Opuntia, 82.

Orchomenos, the city of, deſcribed, 657, & n.

Oreſtes comes to the Lacedæmonian crown in right of his mother, 62. Accuſed of parricide, ibid. Dies in Arcadia, 12, 62. His bones wonderfully diſcovered by a Lacedæmonian, 12, 13, n.

Oreum, a chief city in Eubea, betrayed to the Romans, 606.

Ornytion, the ſon of Siſyphus, king of Corinth, 42.

Oropus, revolts from the Athenians, 308.

Orpheus goes to the Argonautic expedition, 22, 23. n.

Oſſa, mountain in Theſſaly, inhabited by the Centaurs, 16.

Oſtraciſm, how performed at Athens, 193, & 194, n.

Othryades, the only ſurviving champion of Sparta, 408, & 409, n.

Othrys, mountain in Theſſaly, 16.

Oxen, a famous breed in Theſſaly, 17.

Oxus, river in Scythia, 441.

Oxyllus, the three-eyed general of the Heraclidæ, whence he was, 73. Made king of Elis, ibid. & ſeq.

Ozolea, part of ancient Greece, 75. Deſcribed, ibid. & 80, n.

Ozoleans, whence ſo called, 82. Blended with the Locrians, ibid. Send a colony into Italy, ibid.

P.

PAches, Athenian general, takes Mitylene, 274. An Inſtance of his great humanity, 275.

Palemon, the fable of, 37, 38, n.

Pan worſhipped by the Arcadians, 4. His temple at Tegea, ibid. & ſeq. Why worſhipped by the Athenians, 179.

Pantheon at Athens deſcribed, 129.

Parabaſton, the court of, its office, 145.

Paralii, one of the three contending factions at Athens, 111. Deſire a mixt government, ibid.

Parents, Solon's laws relating to them, 121

Parnaſſus, mountain in Phocis, 29.

Paros, iſland, why invaded by Miltiades, 187.

Partheniæ of Sparta, whence ſo called, 417. Forced to retire into Italy, ibid. Found Tarentum, ibid.

Parthenion of Athens, 102, n. 129.

Patrons of Athens, their office, 132.

Pauſanias, king of Sparta, envies Lyſander, 326. Makes peace with Athens, ibid.

——— Spartan general, his untimely haughtineſs, 216. Made general of the Greeks againſt Xerxes, 444. Defeats the Perſians, 445. Rewarded with the tenths of the ſpoil, 448. His great moderation, 447. Goes againſt the Phocians, 490. Degenerates, 450. Starved to death. 452.

Pediæi, one of the three Athenian factions, 117.

Pegaſa, a ſea-port of Theſſaly, 17. Famous for the building of the Argo, ibid.

——— the gulph of, ibid.

Pegaſus, lent by Minerva, to Bellerophon, 42, & n.

Pelaſgia, of Theſſaly, 15.

Pelaſgiotis, part of Theſſally, 15.

Pelaſgus, why ſurnamed Antochton, 3.

——— the firſt king of Arcadia, 8.

Pelias ſends Jaſon in queſt of the golden fleece, 19. His treachery, 23. Death, 24.

Pelion, mountain in Theſſaly, 15.

Peloponneſian war, the cauſes of 260, & ſeq. The nations engaged, 264.

Peloponneſians bring their fleet againſt Xerxes to Salamis, 202. Their flight ſtopt by the policy of Themiſtocles, 203, &c.

——— Join againſt the Athenians, 263. Make early incurſions into Attica, 264. Defeated before Pylus, 279. Make peace, 287. Break it, 288, & ſeq. Diſappointed by the Perſians, 311. Victorious at ſea, 313. Defeated at Samos, 314. By ſea and land, 315, 316. The peace of Antalcidas concluded, 341.

Pelops's coming into Peloponneſus, 70. king of Piſa, ibid.

Peneus, river in Theſſaly, 16.
Pentacoſiomedimni, made the firſt order of Anthenians, 115.
Pericles the ſon of Xanthippus, head of the Athenian faction, 229. His character, 230. Outwits the Lacedæmonians at Megara, 243. Reduces Eubea, 244. His ſevere ordinance againſt the Athenians, of half-blood, ibid. Puniſhed, 245. His great attachment to Aſpaſia, 247, & ſeq. & n. Reduces the Samians, 251, & ſeq. His funeral oration for the ſlain, ibid. Gets Thucydides to be baniſhed, 257. Accuſed of divers crimes, 259, & ſeq. Acquitted, ibid. His conduct at the opening of the Peloponneſian war, 264. His family viſited with the plague, 270. Dies himſelf of it, 271. His character, ibid. & ſeq. & n.
——— the ſon of the former, unjuſtly put to death, 320.
Perinthians beſieged by Philip of Macedon, 357.
Perſes ſucceeds Philip in Macenonia, 642. Courts the Greeks againſt the Romans, ibid. His letter to the Achæans, 643. Rejected, 644. Defeated by the Romans, 646.
Perſians, defeated at Salamis, 204, & ſeq.
Phalerum of Athens, 130.
Pharſalian plains, where ſituate, 16.
Phenaus, lake in Arcadia, 4.
Phidias, the Athenian ſtatuary, condemned, 257.
Phidippides's viſion of the god Pan, 179.
Philip of Macedon's war with the Athenians, 347, & ſeq. Corrupts the Greeks with his gold, 351. Seizes the ſtreights of Thermopylæ, 353. Subdues the Olynthians, 356. Puts an end to the Phocian war, ibid. Beſieges Perinthus and Byzantium, 357. Driven away by Phocion, 358. Invades Phocis, ibid. Defeats the confederates at Chæronea, 359. Murdered, 361.
——— the ſon of Antigonus, his moderation to the revolted Spartans, 538. Beaten out by Lycurgus, 539. Aſſiſts the Achæans, 577. Defeats the Eleans, 578, & ſeq. Takes, and gives Pſophis to the Achæans, 580. Ravages Elis, ibid. His kindneſs to the Achæans, 581. Impoſed on by Apelles, 583. Beſieges Paleis, 586. Invades Ætolia, 587. Takes Thermæ, 588. Invades Lacedæmonia, 591. Appeaſes a ſedition at Corinth. 592. Makes a truce with Ætolia, 564. Takes Thebes of Pthiotis 596. Makes overtures of peace, 597. Concludes it at Naupactus, 599. Sets about enſlaving of Greece, 600, & ſeq. Invades Epirus, 601. Defeated by the Romans, ibid. Cauſes the brave Aratus and his ſon to be poiſoned, 602. Defeats the Ætolians in a new war, 604. Defeated before Elis, 605. Makes a ſecond peace with Ætolia, &c. 609, 610. Breaks it, 610. Forſaken by the Achæans, 613. Invades their country, ibid. Takes Argos, and gives it to Nabis, 614. Forced to make peace with the Romans, 617.
Philobaſilei at Athens, their office, 143.
Philomel, the fable of, 33, & n.
Philopæmen, general of the Achæans, his character, 606. Valour at the battle of Selaſia, 569, 570. Defeats the Lacedæmonians at Mantinea, 541. Kills Machanidas, ibid. & 609. His noble ſpeech to the Achæan ſtates, 621. Defeated at ſea by Nabis, ibid. Beats him at land, 622. Harraſſes the Lacedæmonians, ibid. & ſeq. Defeats Nabis, 623. Some ſignal inſtances of his generoſity, 624. Brings the Lacedæmonians into the Achæan league, 548, 624. Made prætor of Achaia, 626. Wars againſt the Lacedæmonians, 628, & ſeq. Subjects them to the Achæan laws, 629. Marches againſt the rebellious Meſſenians, 634. Taken priſoner by them, 635. Poyſoned, 636. His murderers ſacrificed at his tomb, 638. Other funeral honours, ibid.
Philoſophers baniſhed Athens, 373. Recalled, ibid.
Phineus, a blind ſoothſayer, infeſted with Harpyes, 21, n. Rid of them by Hercules, ibid.
Phliaſians, oppreſt by the Lacedæmonians, 496. Reduced by Ageſilaus, 498.
Phocian war, 350.
——— deſpair, a proverb, whence, 27.
Phocians diſcomfit the Theſſalians in ſeveral encounters, 26, 27, & ſeq. Condemned by the Amphictyon court for ſacriledge, 30, & ſeq. Invade Locris, 488.
Phocion, general of Athens, his character, 354. Relieves Byzantium, 358. Careſt by Alexander, 362, & ſeq. By Antipater, 365, & ſeq. Put to death by the Athenians, 370. His burial, honour, &c. ibid.
Phocis, deſcribed, 29.
Phocus, the ſon of Ornytion, father of the Phocians, 29.
——— the ſon of Æacus, king of Phocis, ibid.
Phœbidas takes the city of Thebes, 497. Killed, 499.
Phreatum, an Athenian court, its office, 145.
Phrynicus, Athenian general, betrayed by Alcibiades, 306, 307. A promoter of oligarchy, 308. Stabbed, 312.
Phrynon, Athenian general, baſely killed by Pittacus, 100.
Phthiotis, part of Theſſaly, 15. Drowned in Deucalion's flood, ibid.

Phya, a baſe woman ſet up by Piſiſtratus, to repreſent Minerva, 157. Married to his ſon Hipparchus, ibid.

Phylarchi, at Athens, their office, 143.

Phyleus the ſon of Augeas, baniſhed for ſiding with Hercules, 71. Reſtored by him, 72. Retires into Dulichium, 73.

Piereus, river in Achaia proper, 86.

Pindarus, tyrant of Epheſus, 114

Pindus river, boundary of Phocis, 29.

Pirithoos, king of Lapitha, 16. Delivered from the Centaurs, by Hercules, ibid.

Piſa, a city in Elis, by whom founded, 69, 70. Why deſtroyed by the Eleans, ib.

Piſander promotes oligarchy at Athens, 308. Goes over to the enemy, 313.

Piſiſtratus, Athenian general, expedition againſt Salamis, 106. Reproved by Solon for his popularity, 150. His ſtratagem to obtain a guard, ibid. & ſeq. In vain oppoſed by Solon, ibid. & ſeq. His letter to him, 153. Solon's anſwer, 154. Uſurps the ſupreme power, 153. His reign, 156, & ſeq. Death and character, 160, 161. & ſeq. & n.

Plague at Athens, deſcribed, 266, n, & ſeq. n.

Platea betrayed to the Thebans, 262. Burnt by the Lacedæmonians, 271. Razed, 275, 453.

Plateans, why attached to the Athenians, 180, n. The only ſtate which joins them againſt the Perſians, ibid. Their obſtinate valour at Marathon, 182. Their bravery againſt the Peloponneſians, 187, 274. Reduced, 275.

Plato hindered from pleading for Socrates, 333. His account of his death, 334, 335.

Pleuron, a city of Ætolia, 78.

Pleuronians, why called, Curetes, ibid.

Pliſtarchus, king of Sparta, his ſhort reign 453.

Pliſtoanax ſucceeds Pliſtarchus, 453. Sent to invade Attica, 456. Betrayed by his tutor, 243, 456. Baniſhed ibid. Recalled by means of the oracle, 460. His death, 464.

Pœon the ſon of Endymion, goes into Pœonia, 70.

Polemarchos at Athens, the third magiſtrate, 90. His office, 142.

Politai, citizens of Athens, ſo called, 131.

Pollux, his fabulous original, 58, n. One of the Argonauts, 20, n. Kills Amycus, ibid. Recovers his ſiſter out of Aphidne, 59. His other exploits, ibid. & ſeq. & n.

Polybius the hiſtorian, ſent deputy to the Roman conſul, 645. Kept priſoner there, 651. Liſts under Scipio, 652. Preſent at the ſiege of Corinth, 688. Defends the memory of the great Philopæmen, 672. In high eſteem with the Romans, 627.

Polydorus, king of Sparta invades Meſſenia, 406, & ſeq. Defeats the Argives, 408. ——— The Meſſenians, 415. His character, ibid. & 416.

Polymeſtor, king of Arcadia, defeats the Lacedæmonians, 13, 14.

Polypercon, head of the Meſſenian faction, 369. Cabals againſt Caſſander, ibid.

Pompus, king of Arcadia, opens a trade into his country, 13, 14.

Potidea, revolts from the Athenians, 256. Reduced by famine, 270. Taken by Timotheus, 270.

Prætors, Achæan, their office, 558.

Procles and Euryſthenes partners in the Spartan kingdom, 51, 52.

Proclidæ, ſo called from him, ibid. A liſt of them, 379.

Proedri at Athens, their office, 136.

Progne, the fable of, 33, n.

Proſecutions, how regulated by Solon's laws, 144.

Proteſilaus, rifled by Artayctes, 211.

Prytanes, chief magiſtrates of Corinth, 40. At Athens their office, 136. A new ſet of them, 308.

Prytaneum, the court of, its power, 145.

Prytanis, king of Lacedæmon, wars againſt the Argives, 64.

Pſophis, deſcribed, 579. Beſieged, ibid. Taken, 580.

Ptolomeus king of Egypt, leagues with the Achæans, 630.

Puniſhments, regulated by Solon, 122.

Paralia, the laſt rank of the Athenian citizens, 132.

Purple, of Elis famed, 66, & n. & 67, &n.

Pydna, the battle of, 646.

Pylus, promontory fortified by the Athenians, 278, & ſeq. Taken by the Lacedæmonians, 317.

Pyrene, the fountain of, at Corinth, 37.

Pyreum, one of the havens at Athens, 128. Improved by Themiſtocles, 216. Demoliſhed by Lyſander, 322. Garriſoned by Demetrius Poliorcet, 376. Sold to the Athenians by Diogenes, 377.

Pyrrhea, Theſſaly ſo called from Pyrrha Deucalion's wife, 15.

Pyrrhus, the ſon of Achilles, 16.

——— king of Epirus, invades Sparta in favour of Cleonymus, 513. Repulſed by the brave Spartan women, 514. Slain in Argos, 517.

——— general of Ætolia, defeated by Philip, 604.

Pythian games, in honour of Apollo, 17.
Pythion, a city of Theſſaly, ibid.
Python, ſerpent killed by Apollo, 17, & n.

Q.

Quinctius, Tit. vid. Flaminius, 611, & ſeq.

R.

Rape, how puniſhed at Athens, 120.
Religious concerns committed to the Areopagi, 140.
Retiarii, net-ſlingers, how they fought, 100, n. The art invented by Pittacus, ibid.
Reviling forbid by Solon, 118.
Rhetium in Aſia, taken by ſome fugitives, 285.
Rhetra, Lycurgus's luws, why ſo called, 396. Approved by the Delphic oracle, 399 How inforced on the Lacedæmonians, ibid. &c.
Rhodians, their confederacy againſt the Athenians, 348.
Romans invited into Greece by the Ætolians, 603. Make peace with Philip, and the Achæans, 609, & ſeq. Renew the war againſt the former, ibid. & ſeq. Make an alliance with the latter, 611. Make peace with Philip and his confederates, 617. Send commiſſaries in favour of the Lacedæmonians, 631. Their inſincerity to the Achæans, 638, & ſeq. Tyrannize over them, 641, 646. Their deputies affronted by them, 658, & ſeq.
Roman ſlaves redeemed by the Achæans, 619.

S.

Sadocus, prince of Thrace's friendſhip to the Athenians, 270.
Salamis iſland, taken by the Megareans, 102. Recovered by Solon, 107, & ſeq. The naval fight of, between the Greeks and Perſians, 204, & ſeq.
Samian war, the grounds of, 247.
Samos, conquered by the Athenians, 250. Democracy eſtabliſhed there, ibid. Revolts, ibid. Retaken and deſtroyed, 251.
Scerdilaidas, king of Illyrium, accedes to the Achæan league, 576. Makes reprizals on the Macedonians, 597, n.
Sciences diſcouraged in Sparta, 389.
Scione revolts from the Athenians, 286.
Scopas, Ætolian general, ravages Macedon, 578.
Scyras, river in Lacedæmon, whence ſo named, 50.
Scyros, iſland, taken by Cimon, 225.
Scytale, Spartan, what, 474. 475, n.
Selaſia, the plague of, deſcribed, 568. The battle of, 569, Seleucus's alliance with the Achæans, 630.
Selinus, king of Ægialea, gives his daughter to Ion, 86.
Senate of Athens, 116. Increaſed 132. How choſen, 136, & ſeq. A new one of 400 choſen, 308, & ſeq. Augmented to five thouſand, 313.
——— of Sparta, inſtituted by Lycurgus, 382.
Senators of Athens, their power, 138, & ſeq. Salary, 139.
Sepulchres, Solon's laws concerning them, 122.
Servants, their condition at Athens, 133
Seſtos, taken by the Athenians, 211.
Sicily divided into two factions, 277.—The war of, ibid. Reconciled by Hermocrates, 283, & ſeq. Invaded by the Athenians, 297.
Sicyon, accedes to the Achæan league, 554.
Sigeum, diſputed by the Athenians and Mytaleneans, 99.
Simplegades, two dangerous rocks, 21, n.
Siſacthia at Athens, what 114.
Siſyphus, the ſuppoſed founder of Corinth, 34. His puniſhment, ibid.
Slaves, how uſed at Athens, 133.
——— at Sparta, 396, & ſeq. & n.
Smenus, river in Lacedæmon, 50.
Socrates prytanis of Athens's integrity, 320 Character and accuſation, 328, 329, & ſeq. His defence, 331. Glorious death, 333, & ſeq.
Solon, Athenian lawgiver's character and deſcent. 104, 105. Elegy on the loſs of Salamis, ibid. Recovers it from the Megareans, 106, & ſeq. Gains his cauſe againſt them, 109. His ſtratagem againſt the Cyreans, 109. Choſen archon, 113. Legiſlator, 115, & ſeq. Builds the city of Solis, 147. His laws, 117, & ſeq. Regulates the Athenian months, 123, & ſeq. & n. Travels into Egypt, Cyprus, &c. 147. Converſes with Thales, ibid. With Crœſus, 148, & n. Quells the Athenian factions, at his return, 149, & ſeq. His juſt reproof to Theſpis, the tragedian, 150. Letter to Epimenides, 152. Anſwer to Piſiſtratus, 154. Death, ibid. & ſeq Great honours paid him by the Athenians, 155.
Solos in Cyprus, whence ſo called, 147.
Soſicrates votes for a peace with the Romans, 665. Unjuſtly tortured to death by the Achæan prætor, ibid.
Soldiers, eſteemed by the Spartans, 390. Lycurgus's laws concerning them, 393.
Sous, king of Lacedæmon, his valour and conqueſts, 63, ſeq. Inſtance of his conduct, ibid.

Sparta, whence so called, 45, 46. Described, 47, 48, &seq. Her kings, vid. sub. Lacedæmon.——Betrayed to the Heraclidæ, 62, 63. Damaged by a great earthquake, 454, & seq. Defended by the valour of her women, 514.

Spartans, whence so called, 46, 47.

Spartus, whose son he was, 46.

Sphacteria, island, taken by the Lacedæmonians, 279. Retaken by the Athenians, 281.

Sphodrias, of Sparta, attempts the pyreum, 498. Protected by Agesilaus, ibid.

Sthenelaides moves for war against Athens, 457.

Strangers, Solon's laws about their naturalization, 132.

Strateges, their office, 558.

Stratocles's devive to alter the months, 374.

Stymphalian birds killed by Hercules, 44.

Styx, a famous river in Arcadia, 44.

Sulpicius, Roman prætor, defeats Philip at Elis, 605.

Sunium, promontory fortified by the Athenians, 304.

Sybarites, a people of Itale of Italy, 245, Defeated by the Crotonians, 246, n. Restored by the Athenians, ibid. & seq. Join in the Achæan league, 552.

Syracuse, head of the Doric faction, 277. Besieged by the Athenians, 298. Relieved by Gylippus, 300.

T.

TAchos, king of Egypt, hie untimely contempt of Agesilaus, 508, 509, n. Causes him to forsake him, ibid.

Teleutias, blockades Corinth, 493. Attempts the pyræum, 405.

Tanagra, taken and raized,, 237, 238.

——— the battle of, 235, & seq.

Tanara, a promontory in Lacedæmon, described, 48, & n.

Taygeta, daughter of Atlas, ravished by Jupiter, 46, & n. Gives name to mount Tagetus, ibid.

Tegea, metropolis of Arcadia 11, & n. Orestes buried at, 12, & n. The battle of, 13, 401, 402.

Tegean women, their bravery, ibid.

Teleclus, king of Sparta's character, and reign, 402, & seq.

Telephus, the son of Hercules, king of Mysia, 568. The fable of him, 11, n.

Telestes, last king of Corinth, murdered, 39, 40.

Teleutias blockades Corinth, 493. Attempts the Pyræum, 595. Slain by the Olynthians, 497.

Telias, the southsayer's stratagem against the Thessalians, 28.

Telissilla's bravery against the Lacedæmonions, 434, 435, n.

Tempea, the valley of, in Thessaly, described, 16.

Temples of Greece plundered and destroyby Xerxes, why, 202.

——of Thermæ burnt by Antigonus, 589.

Tereus, the fable of, 33, n.

Tethys, goddess of the sea, her care for her son Achilles, 24, 25.

Thalana, a city in Lacedæmonia, 49, 50.

Thales, the Milesian divides the year, 125, n. Converses with Solon, 147. His prophecy about the Milesians, 147.

——— a lyric poet, companion of Lycurgus, 380.

Thasians, reduced by Cimon, 227.

Thasus taken from the Athenians, 321.

Thebans, war with the Athenians, 237. Defeated, ibid. Surprize Platea, 262. Their kindness, to the fugitive Athenians, 324. Subdued by the Lacedæmonians, 342. Refuse to join in the peace, 346. Make a separate one with Persia, ibid. Make war with the Lacedæmonians, 347. Subdued by them, 497. By the Romans, 664. The rest see under the next article of Thebes, destroyed by Alexander, 361. Betrayed to the Lacedæmonians, 497. Abandoned to the Romans, 664.

— of Phthiotis, taken by Alexander, 596.

Theft, Solon's laws against it, 121. How far allowed by the Lacedæmonians, 391.

Themistocles, chosen admiral against the Persians, 179, & seq. His power against Aristides, 191, & seq. Chosen general against Xerxes, 196. His stratagem to retain the fleet at Salamis, 202. Reconciled with Aristides, ibid. & seq. Outwits and defeats the Persians, 204, & seq. Highly rewarded by the Athenians, 207. Outwits the Lacedæmonians, 214, & seq. Why banished Athens, 220. Goes into Persia, ibid. & seq. His speech to Artaxerxes, reception, and death, ibid. n. & seq. n.

Theopompus, king of Lacedæmonia, invades Messenia, 406, & seq. Creates the ephori, 411, & 412, n. Reply to his queen's reproach, ibid. Take Ithome by stratagem, 415. His character and death, ibid. & seq.

Theramenes, Athenian admiral, 315. His treachery to his colleagues, 320, & seq. One of the thirty tyrants, 323, & seq. Opposes their measures, ibid. Put to death, ibid. & seq.

Thermæ, surprised and burnt by Antigonus, 588.

Thermodon, the famous battle of, 466, n. & seq.

Ther-

Thermopylæ, the battle of, 440 & ſeq. & n.

Thermus, metropolis of Ætolia, deſcribed, 76. Why called Panætolium, 77.

Theſeus, ſuppoſed the founder of the Iſthmian games, 38 n. His temple at Athens, 129. Made a ſanctuary, 133. His tomb diſcovered, and bones brought to Athens, 225 n.

Theſmothetæ, at Athens, their office, 98, 144.

Theſſalians, brave warriors and horſemen, 18. Give riſe to the fiction of the Centaurs, ibid. Their government, 19. Kings, 20, & ſeq. Drive the Bœotians out of their country, 25. Their native hatred and wars againſt the Phocians, 26, & ſeq. Treachery to the Athenians, 236, & ſeq. Puniſhed by Myronides, 238.

Theſſaliotis, part of antient Theſſaly, 15.

Theſſaly, whence ſo called, 15. Its diviſion, ſituation, &c. ibid. & ſeq. Remarkable for the production of drugs and poiſons, 16. Famous for good horſemen, oxen, &c. 18. Its government, kings, &c. Vide ſub Theſſalians.

Theſſalus, the ſon of Græcus, 15.

——— a name uſed by antient poets for poiſonous drugs, &c. 16.

Thetes, the loweſt rank of Athenians, 115.

Thiaſus, a river in Lacedæmonia, 50.

Thoas, kings of Corinth, 43 n.

——— river in Ætolia, vide Acheloüs, 75.

Thraſybulus, victorious at ſea, 316. Endeavours to reſcue Attica, 324. Recovers Pyreum, 325. Makes peace with Lacedæmon, 326, & ſeq. Refuſes the offers of the thirty tyrants, 327. His hopeful expedition into the Helleſpont, 338. Slain at Aſpendus, 339.

Thraſydras, of Elis, procures a peace with Sparta, 465.

Thraſyllus, unjuſtly put to death, 320.

Thronium, metropolis of Locris Epichnem, 83.

Thucydides commands in Macedon, 285. Saves the city of Ione, ibid.

Thurium, in Sybaris, whence ſo called, 247 n.

Thya, a feaſt of Bacchus, celebrated at Elis, 67. Deſcribed, ibid. & 68 n.

Thyrea, taken by the Athenians, 283.

Timea, the wife of Agis, debauched by Alcibiades, 465, 466. Her fooliſh behaviour, ibid.

Timotheus, Athenian general, his character, 343. Beats the Lacedæmonians at Leucada, 344, & ſeq. His ſucceſs in Macedonia, 347. ——— laſt great captain of Athens. Diſgrace and death, 349.

Tiſamenes, king of Lacedæmonia, outed by the Heraclidæ, 62.

Tiſamenus, king of Mycenia, killed in Achaia, 87.

Tiſſaphernes, influenced by Alcibiades, 306. Put to death, 486.

Tithrauſtes, ſucceeds Tiſſaphernes, 487. Embroils the Grecian ſtates, 488.

Tolmides, Athenian General, the firſt who made an expedition into Laconia, 238. Defeated and killed in Bœotia, 244.

Torch-bearers at Athens, their office, 186 n.

Torone, taken by the Athenians, 347.

Toxotæ, at Athens, their office, 143.

Tragedy, by whom invented, 150. Encouraged by Solon, ibid.

Trapeza, made the metropolis of Arcadia, 12.

Trinaſſus, a ſea-port in Lacedæm. 48.

Triphalians, invaded by the Achæans, 582 & n.

Trophæus, Jupiter, his temple built by the Dores, 85.

Tydeus wounded by Menalippus, 79. Eats his brains, ibid.

Tyndareus made king of Lacedæmonia by Hercules, 57, 58. Builds a temple to Venus, 59.

Tyrants xxx, of Athens, 323. Expelled, 325.

Tyrteus, the lame Athenian ſchool-maſter, appointed general of Sparta, 419. His wiſdom and courage, ibid. & ſeq. Supports the Spartans courage, ibid.

V.

VEnus, her temple at Cyprus, by whom built, 12. At Sparta, by the name of Morpho, 59 & n. Statue, why bound with chains, ibid.

Virgins, Spartan, undecently dreſt, 388.

Uxians, after a gallant defence reduced by Alexander, 298.

W.

WAR, holy, in Greece, why ſo called, 31, 32, & ſeq. Peloponneſian, 260, & ſeq. Æginean, 229. Macedonian, 347. Social, 348. Meſſenian, 405. The ſecond, 418. Bœotian, 498. Cleomenic, 527. Confederate, 576.

Wards and Water, Solon's laws concerning them, 120, 121.

Wills, Solon's laws concerning them, 118.

Wolves

Wolves, a reward for killing them, 120.
Women, Solon's laws concerning them, 119. Againſt the infamous ſort, 120.
—— Spartan, their dreſs, 388. Hardineſs, 392. Bravery, 395.
—— Arcadian, their bravely, 5.
—— Tegean, defeat the Lacedæmonians, 14.
—— of Argos, beat the Spartans from it, 435 n.

X.

XAnthians, why ſo called, 591.
Xanthippus, Athenian general, defeats the Perſians, 210. Takes Seſtos, 211. Impales Artayctes for ſacrilege, 212.
—— the ſon of Pericles, dies of the plague, 270.
Xenarchus, Achæan prætor, declares for Perſes, 643.
Xenias, an Elean, expelled by Thraſydrus, 465.
Xenoi, ſtrangers ſo called at Athens, 132.
Xenoclydes, engages the Corcyreans, 254.
Xenon's ſpeech to the Roman deputies 649.
Xenophon's noble retreat out of Perſia, 174.
Xerxes, his barbarity to the body of the Lacedæmouian king, 441.
Xuthus, grandſon of Deucalion, baniſhed out of Theſſaly, 86. Adjudges the Athenian crown to Cecrops, ibid. Settles in Achaia, ibid.
Xyſtos, or olympic ſtadium, of Elis, deſcribed, 67.

Y.

YOuth, now educated at Sparta, 388, & ſeq.

Z.

ZAcynthus, iſland, deſcribed, 625, 626, n. Reduced by the Athenians, 238. Waſted by the Peloponneſians, 270. Bought by the Achæans, 645, 626. Given up by them to the Romans, ibid.
Zengitæ, the third rank of Athenians 115.
Zeuxidamds, king of Sparta, 416.

The End of the Sixth Volume.